upanishad (ö-pan'i-shad), n. [Skt., a sitting down beside; esoteric doctrine.] In Sanskrit lit., a name given to a series of treatises of theosophic and philosophic contents. They are of different dates. They exhibit the earliest attempts of the Hindu mind to penetrate into the mysteries of creation and existence.

An upanishad is a passage of more philosophic or theosophic character, an excursus into a higher and freer region of thought, away from the details of the ceremonial and their exposition. Whitney, Amer. Jour. Philol., VII. 1.

upas (ū'pas), n. [= F. upas, < Malay (Java) ūpas, poison. In Borneo, Celebes, and other places īpoh, īpo.] 1. The poisonous sap of different trees of the Malayan and Philippine Islands, more or less used for arrow-poison. The upas-antiar is yielded by the antiar or upas-tree. (See def. 2 and antiar.) The upas tieuté, or upas radja, is from the chettik or tjettek, Strychnos Tieute, one of the strychnine-trees.

2. The tree Ipo toxicaria, one of the largest Javanese trees, having a cylindrical stem 60 or 70 feet high below the branches. Upon incision a poisonous milky juice flows from the trunk, concreting into a gum, which is mixed with the seed of Capsicum frutescens and various aromatic substances to form one kind of arrow-poison. The action of the poison is first purgative and emetic, then narcotic, destroying life by tetanic convulsions. Fable invests this tree with a deadly influence upon whatever comes under its branches. It is true that when the tree is felled or the bark extensively wounded it exhales an effluvium producing cutaneous eruptions; otherwise the upas may be approached and ascended like other trees. See Antiaris and sack-tree.

Fierce in dread silence, on the blasted heath,
Fell upas sits, the hydra-tree of death.

Greene, James IV., iii. 3.

uptails-all† (up′tālz-âl), n. Confusion; riot; hence, revelers. (Davies.) uptake (up-tāk′), v. t. 1. To take up; take into the hand. Spenser, F. Q., II. ii. 11.—2†. To succor; help.

The right hond of my iust man uptook thee.
Wyclif, Isa. xli. 10.

★uptake (up′tāk), n. [< uptake, v.] 1. The act of taking up; lifting.

To this ascensional movement [in cyclones] undoubtedly must be attributed the rain and cloud which we find there—rain near the centre, where the ascensional impulse is strongest; cloud round the outside, where the uptake is less strong. Science, XI. 215.

2. Perceptive power; apprehension; conception: as, he is quick in the uptake. Scott, Old Mortality, vii. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]—3. The upcast pipe from the smoke-box of a steam-boiler, leading to the chimney.—Gleg at the uptake. See gleg[1].

uptaker† (up-tā′kėr), n. [ME., < uptake + -er[1].] A helper; a supporter. Wyclif, Ps. lxxxviii.

uptear (up-tār′), v. t. To tear up. Milton, P. L., vi. 663.

upthrow (up-thrō′), v. t. To throw up; elevate.

upthrow (up′thrō), n. [< upthrow, v.] An upheaval; an uplift: in mining, the opposite of downthrow. Where a fault has occurred which has been attended by an up-and-down movement of the rock on each side, the displacement in the upward direction is called the upthrow, and that in the downward direction the downthrow. As a result of this motion, under great pressure, of the two adjacent rock-faces, it is sometimes observed that the bedding of the formation has been influenced in its position along the line of the fault, and to a greater or less distance from it, the dip being downward on the downthrow side and upward on the upthrow side of the fault. This is called by the miner "dipping to the downthrow" and "rising to the upthrow." Also used attributively.

We rarely meet with a fissure which has been made a true fault with an upthrow and downthrow side.
Geikie, Geol. Sketches, xi.

upthrust (up'thrust), n. A thrust in an upward direction; in geol., an upheaval; an uplift. A term rarely used, and then generally as meaning a thrusting or lifting upward of a mass of rock more violent in its motion and more local in character than is generally understood to be the case when the term upheaval or uplift is used. Thus, the uplift of a continent; the upthrust of a mass of eruptive or intrusive rock. Also used attributively.

To this mass, which I have no doubt is an upthrust portion of the old crystalline floor, succeeds another mass of "spotted rock." Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLVI. 216.

upthunder (up-thun'dėr), v. i. To send up a loud thunder-like noise. [Rare.]

Central fires through nether seas upthundering.
Coleridge, To the Departing Year.

uptie† (up-tī'), v. t. To tie or twist up; wind up.
Spenser, F. Q., VI. iv. 24.

uptill† (up-til'), prep. [< up + till[2].] On; against; up to.

She [the nightingale] . . . as all forlorn,
Lean'd her breast up-till a thorn,
And then sang the dolefull'st ditty; . . .
"Fie, fie, fie," now would she cry;
"Tereu, tereu," by and by!
Shak., Pass. Pilgrim, xxi. 10.

uptilt (up-tilt'), v. t. To tilt up: chiefly in the past participle.

He finds that he has crossed the uptilted formations, and has reached the ancient granitic and crystalline rocks.
Geikie, Geol. Sketches, ix.

up-to-date (up'tȯ-dāt'), a. Extending to the present time; inclusive of or making use of the latest facts: as, an up-to-date account. [Colloq.]

A good up-to-date English work on the islands.
The Academy, No. 822, Feb. 4, 1888, p. 73.

uptoss (up-tos'), v. t. To toss or throw up, as the head, with a sudden motion. St. Nicholas, XVII. 866. [Rare.]

uptossed, uptost (up-tost'), a. 1. Tossed upward.—2. Agitated; harassed.

Uptost by mad'ning passion and strife.
Jones Very, Poems, p. 124.

up-town (up'toun), prep. phr. as adv. To or in the upper part of a town. [U. S.] up-town (up'toun'), prep. phr. as a. Situated in or belonging to the upper part of a town: as, an up-town residence. [Colloq., U. S.]

uptrace (up-trās'), v. t. To trace up; investigate; follow out. Thomson, Summer, l. 1746.

uptrain† (up-trān'), v. t. To train up; educate.
Spenser, F. Q., II. x. 27.

uptrill (up-tril'), v. t. To sing or trill in a high voice.

But when the long-breathed singer's uptrilled strain Bursts in a squall, they gape for wonderment.
Coleridge, In a Concert-Room. (Davies.)

upturn (up-tėrn'), v. I. trans. To turn up: as, to upturn the ground in plowing.

With lusty strokes up-turn'd the flashing waves.
Cowper, Odyssey, xiii.

II. intrans. To turn up.

The leaden eye of the sidelong shark Upturned patiently. Lowell, The Sirens.

upturning (up-tėr'ning), n. The act of turning or throwing up, or the state of being upturned.

There was at this time (as the mammalian age draws to a close) no chaotic upturning, but only the opening of creation to its fullest expansion.
Dawson, Origin of World, p. 235.

Upucerthia (ū-pū-sėr'thi-ą), n. [NL. (Isidore Geoffroy St. Hilaire, 1832; also Uppucerthia, the same, 1838), also Huppucerthia, in full form Upupicerthia (Agassiz, 1846), < NL. Upu(pa) + Certhia, q. v.] A genus of Neotropical birds, of the family Dendrocolaptidæ. There are 6 or 8 species, of moderate size and general brownish plumage, varying much in the size and shape of the bill, which is as long as the head or longer, and nearly straight or much curved. The type is U. dumetoria of Chili, Patagonia, and parts of the Argentine Republic. Coprotretis (Cabanis and Heine, 1859) is a strict synonym; and the species with the nearly straight bill (U. ruficauda) has been the type of a genus Ochetorhynchus (Meyer, 1832).

Upucerthia dumetoria.

Upucerthidæ (ū-pū-sėr'thi-dē), n. pl. [NL. (first as Uppucerthidæ, D'Orbigny), < Upucerthia + -idæ.] A family of birds: same as Dendrocolaptidæ or Anabatidæ[1].

Upupa (ū'pū-pą), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1748), < L. upupa = Gr. ἔποψ, the hoopoe: see hoop[3], hoopoe.] The only extant genus of Upupidæ. There are several species, as the common hoopoe of Africa and Europe, U. epops. See cut under hoopoe.

Upupidæ (ū-pū'pi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Upupa + -idæ.] 1. A family of tenuirostral picarian or non-passerine birds, of which the genus Upupa is the type. The family was founded by Bonaparte in 1838, but its limits vary with different authors. Gray makes it cover 3 subfamilies, Upupinæ, Irrisorinæ, and Epimachinæ; but it is now restricted to the first of these. 2. A family of upupoid picarian birds, of which Upupa is the only living genus, of terrestrial habits, with non-metallic plumage, short square tail, and large erectile compressed circular crest; the true hoopoes, as distinguished from the wood-hoopoes or Irrisoridæ.

upupoid (ū'pū-poid), a. [< Upupa + -oid.] Resembling a hoopoe; of or pertaining to the Upupoideæ.

Upupoideæ (ū-pū-poi'dē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Upupa + -oideæ.] A superfamily of tenuirostral picarian birds, approaching the passerines in many respects, but most nearly related to the hornbills, containing both the terrestrial and the arboricole hoopoes (not the plumebirds: see Epimachinæ). The group is peculiar to the Old World, and is chiefly African. There are 2 families, Upupidæ and Irrisoridæ.

upwafted (up-wâf'ted), a. Borne up; carried aloft with a waving or undulatory motion.
Cowper, Iliad, viii.

upwall (up-wâl'), v. t. [ME. upwallen; < up + wall[1].] To wall up; inclose with a wall.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 17.

upward (up'wärd), a. and n. [< ME. upward*, < AS. upweard, upward, upright, < up, up, + -weard = E. -ward. Cf. upward, adv.] I. a. Directed or turned to a higher place; having an ascending direction, literally or figuratively.

Thus far our fortune keeps an upward course.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., v. 3. 1.

About her feet were little beagles seen,
That watch'd with upward eyes the motions of their queen.
Dryden, Pal. and Arc., l. 1254.

Upward irrigation. See irrigation.

II. n. The top; the height. [Rare.]

The extremest upward of thy head.
Shak., Lear, v. 3. 136.

upward, upwards (up'wärd, -wärdz), adv. [< ME. upward, uppard, also upwardes, < AS. upweard*, upweardes (= D. opwaarts = MLG. upwart, upwort, also upwordes = G. aufwärts), < up, up, + -weard = E. -ward. Cf. upward, a.] 1. Toward a higher place; in an ascending course: opposed to downward.

This Nicholas sat ay as stille as stoon,
And ever gaped upward into the eir.
Chaucer, Miller's Tale, l. 287.

I felt to his knees, and they were as cold as any stone; and so upward and upward, and all was as cold as any stone. Shak., Hen. V., ii. 3. 27.

2. Toward heaven and God.

Crizinge vpward to Crist and to his clene moder.
Piers Plowman (A), v. 262.

Whose mind should always, as the fire, aspire upwards to heavenly things.
Sir T. More, Life of Picus (Int. to Utopia, p. lxxvii.).

3. With respect to the higher part; in the upper parts.

Upward man, and downward fish. Milton.

4. Toward the source or origin: as, trace the stream upward.

And trace the muses upward to their spring.
Pope, tr. of Statius's Thebaid, i.

5. More: used indefinitely.

Children of th[e] age of .xii. or .xiii. yeares or vppewarde are diuided into two companyes, whereof the one breake the stones into smaule pieces, and the other cary furth that which is broken.
R. Eden, tr. of Diodorus Siculus (First Books on America, [ed. Arber, p. 369).

I am a very foolish fond old man,
Fourscore and upward. Shak., Lear, iv. 7. 61.

6. On; onward.

From the age of xiiii. yeres uppewarde.
Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, i. 16.

Upward of, more than; above: as, upward of ten years have elapsed; upward of a hundred men were present.

I have been your wife . . .
Upward of twenty years.
Shak., Hen. VIII., ii. 4. 36.

upwardly (up'wärd-li), adv. In an upward manner or direction; upward.

A filament was fixed to a young upwardly inclined leaf.
Darwin, Movement in Plants, iv.

upwards, adv. See upward.

upways (up'wāz), adv. [< up + ways for -wise.] Upward. [Colloq.]

Distance measured upways from O A indicates roughly the degree of hardness. Elect. Rev. (Eng.), XXVII. 653.

upwell (up-wel'), v. i. To upspring; issue forth, as water from a fountain. Scribner's Mag., VIII. 435.

upwhirl (up-hwėrl'), v. I. intrans. To rise upward in a whirl; whirl upward.

II. trans. To raise upward in a whirling course. Milton, P. L., iii. 493.

upwind (up-wīnd'), v. t. To wind up; roll up; convolve. Spenser, F. Q., I. i. 15.

up-wind (up'wind'), prep. phr. as adv. Against or in the face of the wind. [Colloq.]

Snipe nearly always rise against and go away up-wind, as closely as possible.
Dogs of Great Britain and America, p. 256.

upwreathe (up-rēŦH'), v. i. To rise with a curling motion; curl upward. Longfellow, Building of the Ship. [Rare.]

upyaft. An obsolete preterit of upgive.

ur (ėr), interj. [Intended to represent a meaningless utterance also denoted by uh, er, etc.] Used substantively in the quotation.

And when you stick on conversation's burrs
Don't strew your pathway with those dreadful urs.
O. W. Holmes, Urania.

uracano†, n. [Another form of hurricano, with an Italian-seeming plural uracani: see hurricano, hurricane.] A hurricane.

Iamaica is almost as large as Boriquen. It is extremely subiect to the uracani, which are such terrible gusts of Winde that nothing can resist them.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 903.

urachus (ū'ra-kus), n.; pl. urachi (-kī). [NL., < Gr. οὐραχός, the urinary canal of a fetus, < οὖρον, urine: see urine.] In anat., a fibrous cord extending from the fundus of the bladder to the umbilicus. It represents in the adult a part of the sac of the allantois and associate allantoic vessels of the fetus, whose cavities have become obliterated. It is that intra-abdominal section of the navel-string which is constituted by so much of the allantoic sac and the hypogastric arteries as becomes impervious, the section remaining pervious being the bladder and superior vesical arteries. It sometimes remains pervious, as a malformation, when a child may urinate by the navel. See also ureter.

uræa, n. Plural of uræum.

uræmia, uræmic. See uremia, uremic.

uræum (ū-rē'um), n.; pl. uræa (-ą). [NL., < Gr. οὐραῖον, the hinder part, the tail; neut. of οὐραῖος, of the tail, < οὐρά, tail.] In ornith., the entire posterior half of a bird: opposed to stethiæum. [Rare.]

uræus (ū-rē'us), n. [NL., < Gr. οὐραῖος, of the tail: see uræum.] The sacred serpent, either the head and neck, or sometimes the entire form, of a serpent, represented by the ancient Egyptians upon the head-dresses of divinities and royal personages, as an emblem of supreme power. It also occurs frequently on either side of a winged solar disk, emblematic of the supremacy of the sun, of good over evil, or of Horus over Set. The actual basis of the symbol is supposed to be the Egyptian asp or cobra, Naja haje. See also cut under asp.

Uræus.—Head of Statue of Menephtah (the supposed "Pharaoh of the Exodus") from Memphis, now in the Berlin Museum.

ural (ū′ral), n. A hypnotic remedy, formed by the combination of chloral hydrate with urethane.

Ural-Altaic (ū′ral-al-tā″ik), a. See Altaic.

Uralian (ū-rā′li-an), a. [< Ural (see def.) (Russ. Uralŭ) + -i-an.] Relating to the river Ural, or to the Ural Mountains, in Russia and Siberia.

Uralic (ū-ral′ik), a. [< Ural (see def.) + -ic.] Pertaining to the Ural Mountains or river Ural.

uralite (ū′ral-īt), n. [< Ural + *-ite*2.] The name given by G. Rose to a mineral which has the crystalline form of augite, but the physical properties and especially the cleavage and specific gravity of hornblende. Uralite is generally called a paramorph of hornblende, but this paramorphism is frequently accompanied by some chemical change, especially the elimination of more or less lime, which appears intermingled with the hornblende in the form of calcite or epidote. See uralitization.—Uralite-syenite, a name sometimes applied in petrography to a variety of syenite in which the green fibrous amphibole, known as uralite, replaces common hornblende. The rock was first described by Jeremejeff (1872) from Turgojak in the Ural Mountains.

uralitic (ū-ra-lit′ik), a. [< uralite + -ic.] In petrog., having the characters of uralite in a greater or less degree; containing, or consisting wholly or in part of, uralite. See uralitization.

uralitization (ū-ra-lit-i-zā′shon), n. The paramorphic change of augite to hornblende. See uralite. This form of metamorphism is of very common occurrence, especially among the diabases, some varieties of which rock are, for this reason, called uralite-diabase; the same is true also of the porphyries and porphyrites, giving rise to the name uralite-porphyry and uralite-porphyrite.

uralitize (ū′ral-i-tīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. uralitized, ppr. uralitizing. [< uralite + -ize.] In petrog., to convert into uralite.

uran (ū′ran), n. Same as varan.

uranate (ū′ra-nāt), n. [< uran(ic) + *-ate*1.] A salt formed by the union of uranic oxid with a basic metallic oxid.

Urania.—From an antique in the Louvre.

uran-glimmer (ū′ran-glim″ėr), n. Same as uranite.

Urania (ū-rā′ni-ą), n. [NL., < L. Urania, < Gr. Οὐρανία, one of the Muses, lit. 'the Heavenly One,' fem. of οὐράνιος, heavenly, < οὐρανός, the vault of heaven, the sky: see Uranus.] 1. In Gr. myth., the Muse of astronomy and celestial forces, and the arbitress of fate, second only to Calliope in the company of the Muses. Her usual attributes are a globe, which she often holds in her hand, and a little staff or a compass for indicating the course of the stars. See *Muse*2. 2. A genus of large and handsome diurnal moths, typical of the family Uraniidæ, as U. fulgens. Fabricius, 1808. They have a short but stout body, anterior wings with a very oblique external margin, and dentate hind wings with long tails. They greatly resemble butterflies of the genus Papilio, and are sometimes called butterfly hawk-moths. They occur most commonly in tropical and subtropical America. A few species, however, have been found in Madagascar and on the east coast of Africa. The larva is cylindrical with long delicate setæ, and the pupa is inclosed within a thin cocoon. 3. In ornith., a genus of humming-birds. Fitzinger, 1863.

Butterfly Hawk moth (Urania fulgens), two thirds natural size.

Uranian (ū-rā′ni-an), a. [< Uranus + -ian.] Of or pertaining to the planet Uranus.

> The most singular circumstance attending the whole Uranian system.
> Ball, Story of the Heavens, p. 169. (Encyc. Dict.) uranic1 (ū-ran′ik), a. [< Gr. οὐρανός, heaven, the sky (see Uranus), + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the heavens; celestial; astronomical.

> On I know not what telluric or uranic principles.
> Carlyle.

uranic2 (ū-ran′ik), a. [< uranium + -ic.] Pertaining to, obtained from, or containing uranium: noting salts in which the uranium is present as uranyl, UO_2, or in which uranium oxid acts as an acid.

uraniferous (ū-ra-nif′e-rus), a. Containing or characterized by the presence of uranium.

Uraniidæ (ū-ra-nī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Westwood, 1840), < Urania + -idæ.] A family of moths, much resembling butterflies of the family Papilionidæ, belonging between the Sesiidæ and Zygænidæ. In Westwood's system it included the forms now separated in the family Castniidæ. The species are all tropical. The principal genera are Urania and Nyctalæmon.

uraninite (ū-ran′i-nīt), n. [< uran(ium) + *-in*1 + *-ite*2.] A mineral of a pitch-black color and very heavy, having when unaltered a specific gravity of 9.5. It usually occurs massive, rarely in regular octahedrons, and is commonly met with in granitic rocks. Its exact chemical composition is uncertain, but it consists essentially of the oxids of uranium (UO_3,UO_2), also thorium, lead, and other elements in small amount, with, further, from 1 to 2.5 per cent. of nitrogen. It is the chief source of uranium; and it is also the only mineral in the primitive crust of the earth in which the element nitrogen is known to exist. Also called pitch-blende.

uranion (ū-rā′ni-on), n. A musical instrument, invented in 1810 by Buschmann. It consisted of a graduated set of pieces of wood which could be sounded by pressure against a revolving wheel. It was played from a keyboard.

uranisci, n. Plural of uraniscus.

uranisconitis (ū-ra-nis-kō-nī′tis), n. [NL., < Gr. οὐρανίσκος, the roof of the mouth (see uraniscus), + -nitis.] Inflammation of the uraniscus or palate.

uraniscoplasty (ū-ra-nis′kō-plas-ti), n. [< Gr. οὐρανίσκος, the roof of the mouth, + πλάσσειν, form, mold, shape.] Plastic surgery of the palate. Also uranoplasty.

uraniscorraphy (ū″ra-nis-kor′a-fi), n. [< Gr. οὐρανίσκος, the roof of the mouth, + ῥαφή, a seam, a sewing, < ῥάπτειν, sew.] Suture of the palate.

uraniscus (ū-ra-nis′kus), n.; pl. uranisci (-sī). [NL., < Gr. οὐρανίσκος, the roof of the mouth, lit. 'a little vault,' dim. of οὐρανός, the vault of heaven: see Uranus.] In anat., the roof, vault, or canopy of the mouth—that is, the palate. See cut under palate.

uranite (ū′ra-nīt), n. [< uranium + *-ite*2.] An ore of uranium, of an emerald-green, grass-green, leek-green, or yellow color, transparent or subtranslucent. Mineralogically it includes two species—autunite, a phosphate of uranium and calcium (lime uranite), and torbernite, a phosphate of uranium and copper (copper uranite). Also called uran-glimmer and uran-mica.

uranitic (ū-ra-nit′ik), a. [< uranite + -ic.] Pertaining to or containing uranite.

uranium (ū-rā′ni-um), n. [NL.: so called in allusion to the planet Uranus, and in compliment to Sir W. Herschel, its discoverer; < Uranus, q. v.] Chemical symbol, U; atomic weight, 238.5. A metal discovered by Klaproth, in 1789, in a mineral which had been long known, and called pitch-blende, but which was supposed to be an ore of either zinc or iron. The metal itself was first isolated by Péligot, that which Klaproth had supposed to be a metal proving, on further examination, to be an oxid. Metallic uranium as obtained by the reduction of the chlorid has a specific gravity of 18.7, and resembles nickel in color. Uranium is far from being a widely distributed element; its combinations are few in number, and most of them rare. Pitch-blende is the most abundant and important of them, consisting chiefly of uranoso-uranic oxid, with usually a considerable percentage of impurities of various kinds, especially sulphuret of lead, arsenic, etc. Uranium belongs to the chromium group of elementary bodies. Sodium diuranate, or uranium-yellow, is quite an important yellow pigment, which is used on glass and porcelain, and in making yellow glass. The radio-activity of uranium, its compounds, and associated substances, has of late attracted great interest.

uran-mica (ū′ran-mī″kä), n. [< uran(ium) + mica.] Same as uranite.

uran-ocher (ū′ran-ō″kėr), n. [< uran(ium) + ocher.] A yellow earthy oxid of uranium. It occurs in soft friable masses, disseminated or incrusting, along with pitch-blende or uraninite, in the granites of Saxony and France.

uranographic (ū″ra-nō-graf′ik), a. [< uranograph-y + -ic.] Of or pertaining to uranography. Also ouranographic.

uranographical (ū″ra-nō-graf′i-kal), a. [< uranographic + -al.] Same as uranographic. Also ouranographical.

uranographist (ū-ra-nog′ra-fist), n. [< uranograph-y + -ist.] One versed in uranography. Also ouranographist.

uranography (ū-ra-nog′ra-fi), n. [< Gr. οὐρανός, heaven, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] That branch of astronomy which consists in the description of the fixed stars, their positions, magnitudes, colors, etc.; uranology. Also ouranography.

uranolite† (ū-ran′ō-līt), n. [< Gr. οὐρανός, heaven, + λίθος, stone.] A meteorite. At an early period in the history of the study of meteorites they were sometimes called uranolites, more generally aërolites; in later years the name meteorite has become generally adopted wherever English is spoken, and the same is true for most of the other European languages.

uranology (ū-ra-nol′ō-ji), n. [< Gr. οὐρανός, heaven, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The knowledge of the heavens.

uranometry (ū-ra-nom′e-tri), n.; pl. uranometries (-triz). [< Gr. οὐρανός, heaven, + -μετρία, < μέτρον, measure.] 1. The measurement of stellar distances.—2. A description of the principal fixed stars arranged in constellations, with their designations, positions, and magnitudes.

> The uranometries of Bayer [1603], Flamsteed, Argelander, Heis, and Gould give the lucid stars of one or both hemispheres laid down on maps.
> Newcomb and Holden, Astron., p. 435.

uranoplasty (ū′ra-nō-plas-ti), n. Same as uraniscoplasty.

uranoscope (ū′ra-nō-skōp), n. [< NL. Uranoscopus.] A fish of the genus Uranoscopus; a star-gazer. See cut under star-gazer.

Uranoscopidæ (ū″ra-nō-skop′i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Richardson, 1848), < Uranoscopus + -idæ.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, whose type genus is Uranoscopus; the star-gazers. The family has been variously limited. By American ichthyologists it is restricted to those species, chiefly inhabiting warm temperate seas of both hemispheres, which have an oblong body, cuboid head with nearly vertical eyes and mouth, oblong anal fin, complete jugular ventral fins, and the lateral line running near the dorsal fin. See cut under star-gazer.

Uranoscopus (ū-ra-nos′kō-pus), n. [NL. (Gronovius; Linnæus, 1766), < L. uranoscopus, < Gr. οὐρανοσκόπος, a fish called otherwise καλλιώνυμος (see Callionymus), lit. 'observing the heavens,' < οὐρανός, the heavens, + σκοπεῖν, observe, view.] The typical genus of Uranoscopidæ. U. scaber is a Mediterranean fish, known to the ancients.

uranoscopy (ū′ra-nō-skō-pi), n. [< Gr. οὐρανοσκοπία*, < οὐρανοσκόπος, observing the heavens, < οὐρανός, the heavens, + σκοπεῖν, view.] Contemplation of the heavenly bodies.

uranostomatoscopy (ū″ra-nō-stom′a-tō-skō-pi), n. [< Gr. οὐρανός, the vault of heaven, the roof of the mouth, + στόμα(τ-), the mouth, + σκοπεῖν, view.] Inspection of the roof of the mouth or palate: as, "phrenopathic uranostomatoscopy," Medical News, XLIX. 559. [Rare.]

uranothorite (ū″ra-nō-thō′rīt), n. A variety of the thorium silicate; thorite containing a small percentage of oxid of uranium.

uranous (ū′ra-nus), a. [< uranium + -ous.] Of or pertaining to the metal uranium: noting salts of which the base is uranium protoxid.

Uranus (ū′ra-nus), n. [< L. Urănus, < Gr. Οὐρανός, Uranus, a personification of οὐρανός, the vault of heaven, the sky, heaven, the heavens, = Skt. Varuna, a deity of highest rank in the Veda, later a god of the waters, < √ var, cover, encompass.] 1. In classical myth., the son of Ge or Gaia (the Earth), and by her the father of the Titans, Cyclopes, etc. He hated his children, and confined them in Tartarus; but on the instigation of Gaia, Kronos, the youngest of the Titans, overthrew and dethroned him. Also written Ouranos. 2. In astron., the outermost but one of the planets, appearing to the naked eye as a faint star. It was discovered as a moving body with a disk, March 13th, 1781, by Sir W. Herschel, but had previously been observed twenty times as a star by different observers. These are called the ancient observations of Uranus. The planet, seen with a telescope of the first class, appears as a small bluish disk with two bands. The diameter perpendicular to these is less than that parallel to them by $\frac{1}{14}$. It is a little smaller than Neptune, its diameter being 31,000 miles; its mass is $\frac{1}{22800}$ of the sun, or 14.7 times that of the earth; its density is therefore about 1.4, being a little more than that of Jupiter. It is about 19.2 times as far from the sun as the earth is; and its period of revolution is about eighty-four years and one week. It has four satellites—Ariel, Umbriel, Titania, and Oberon—of which the first two are extremely difficult telescopic objects. They revolve in one plane nearly perpendicular to that of the orbit of the planet.

urao (ö-rä′ō), n. [= F. urao; S. Amer. Span.] A native name for natron found in the dried-up lakes and river-courses of South America: same as the trona of the Egyptian lakes. See natron, trona.

Urapterygidæ (ū-rap-te-rij′i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Guenée, 1857), ‹ Urapteryx (-pteryg-) + -idæ.] A family of geometrid moths, typified by the genus Urapteryx, having the fore wings always acuminate and the hind wings usually caudate. The species are mainly tropical, but the family is represented in all parts of the world. The larvæ are much elongated, and are furnished with protuberances, especially on the eighth segment. The pupæ are inclosed in loose net-like cocoons suspended from leaves. Fourteen genera and more than 100 species have been described. Chærodes and Oxydia are the other principal genera. Also Urapterydæ, Ourapteridæ, Ourapterygidæ, etc.

Urapteryx (ū-rap′te-riks), n. [NL. (Boisduval, 1832), ‹ Gr. οὐρά, tail, + πτέρυξ, wing.] A genus of geometrid moths, typical of the family Urapterygidæ, having the body moderately slender, the third joint of the palpi indistinct, the fore wings acute and triangular, and the hind wings with a caudiform angle on the exterior border. The species are found in tropical America, Asia, and Europe. U. sambucaria is the only European one.

urari (ö-rä′ri), n. [Tupi urari.] Curari.

urate (ū′rāt), n. [‹ ur-ic + -ate[1].] A salt of uric acid. See uric.

uratic (ū-rat′ik), a. [‹ urate + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the urates.—Uratic diathesis, in med., a condition in which there is a tendency to the deposition of urates from the blood in the joints and other parts of the body; a predisposition to gout.

uratoma (ū-rā-tō′mä), n. A deposit of urates in the tissues; tophus.

uratosis (ū-rā-tō′sis), n. In med., the condition in which a deposition of crystalline urates takes place in the tissues.

Urauges (ū-râ′jēz), n. [NL. (Cabanis, 1851), ‹ Gr. οὐρά, tail, + αὐγή, light, sheen, pl. the eyes. Cf. Lipaugus.] A genus of African glossy starlings, having the tail in the typical species greatly lengthened. It is based upon the glossy thrush of Latham (1783), which is the same bird that served as type of the genera Lamprotornis (Temminck) and Juida (Lesson). U. caudatus inhabits western and northeastern Africa; the male is 18 inches long, of which the tail makes two thirds; the plumage is glossy oil-green, with steel-blue, purple, violet, and bronze tints, in some parts marked with velvety black. Several other species of this genus are described.

urban (ėr′ban), a. and n. [= F. urbain = Sp. Pg. It. urbano, ‹ L. urbanus, of or pertaining to a city or city life, hence polite, refined, urbane; as a noun, a dweller in a city; ‹ urbs, city. Cf. suburb, suburban. Cf. also urbane.] I. a. 1. Of or belonging to a city or town; resembling a city; characteristic of a city; situated or living in towns or cities: as, an urban population; urban districts.

And, however advanced the urban society may be, . . . the spirit of progress does not spread very far in the country. G. P. Lathrop, Spanish Vistas, p. 183.

2† Civil; courteous in manners; polite. [In this sense urbane is now used.]—Urban servitudes, in law. See predial servitude, under servitude.

II. n. One who belongs to or lives in a town or city.

urbane (ėr-bān′), a. [‹ L. urbanus, of or pertaining to a city or city life, hence refined, polished, urbane: see urban. Urbane is to urban as humane is to human.] 1. Of or belonging to a city or town; urban. [Rare.]

Though in no sense national, he [Horace] was, more truly than any has ever been since, till the same combination of circumstances produced Béranger, an urbane or city poet. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 239.

2. Civil; courteous; polite; usually, in a stronger sense, very polite; suave; elegant or refined: as, a man of urbane manners.

A more civil and urbane kind of life.
World of Wonders (1608).

So I the world abused—in fact, to me
Urbane and civil as a world could be.
Crabbe, Works, VIII. 159.

=Syn. 2. Civil, Courteous, etc. See polite.

urbanely (ėr-bān′li), adv. In an urbane manner; courteously; politely; suavely.

Urbanist (ėr′ban-ist), n. [‹ Urban (L. Urbanus) (see def.) + -ist.] 1. An adherent of Pope Urban VI., in opposition to whom a faction set up Clement VII. in 1378, thus beginning the great schism.—2. A member of a branch of the Clarisses following a mitigated rule. See Clarisse.

urbanity (ėr-ban′i-ti), n. [‹ F. urbanité = Sp. urbanidad = Pg. urbanidade = It. urbanità, ‹ L. urbanita(t-)s, politeness, ‹ urbanus, polite, urbane: see urbane, urban.] 1. The character of being urbane; that civility or courtesy of manners which is acquired by associating with well-bred people; politeness; suavity; courtesy.

So will they keep their measures true,
And make still their proportions new,
Till all become one harmony,
Of honour, and of courtesy,
True valour and urbanity.
B. Jonson, Love Restored.

Do you find all the urbanity in the French which the world gives us the honour of?
Sterne, Sentimental Journey, p. 87.

2. A polished humor or facetiousness.

Moral doctrine, and urbanity, or well-mannered wit, are the two things which constitute the Roman satire.
Dryden, tr. of Juvenal, Ded.

If in this respect [the wrong use of pleasantry and humor] we strain the just measure of what we call urbanity, and are apt sometimes to take a buffooning rustick air, we may thank the ridiculous solemnity and sour humour of our pedagogues.
Shaftesbury, Wit and Humour, I. v.

urbanize (ėr′ban-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. urbanized, ppr. urbanizing. [‹ urban + -ize.] To render urbane. Howell, Forraine Travell, p. 9.

Urbicolæ† (ėr-bik′ō-lē), n. pl. [NL. (Linnæus, 1758), pl. of urbicola: see urbicolous.] A group of butterflies including forms now placed in the Hesperidæ; the skippers.

urbicolous (ėr-bik′ō-lus), a. [‹ NL. urbicola, dwelling in a city, ‹ L. urbs (urbis), city, + colere, dwell in, inhabit.] Inhabiting a city; urban. Eclectic Rev. [Rare.]

urbi et orbi (ėr′bī et ôr′bī). [L.: urbi, dat. of urbs, city (see urban); et, and; orbi, dat. of orbis, the world (see orb).] To the city (that is, Rome) and the world. The phrase is used in the publication of papal bulls, and (according to Larousse) by the Pope in pronouncing his blessing in the church of the Lateran on Maundy Thursday, Easter, and Ascension day.

Urceola (ėr-sē′ō-lä), n. [NL., ‹ L. urceolus, a little pitcher or urn: see urceolus.] 1. [Roxburgh, 1794: so called with ref. to the form of the corolla.] An untenable name for Chavannesia, a genus of plants, of the family Apocynaceæ. It is characterized by an urceolate or globose corolla with somewhat induplicately valvate lobes (in its order a very rare arrangement). It includes 7 species, natives of the Malay peninsula and archipelago. They are shrubby climbers with opposite feather-veined leaves, and dense cymes of small flowers corymbosely panicled at the ends of the branches. Chavannesia elastica (Urceola elastica of Roxburgh) is the caoutchouc-vine of Sumatra and Borneo, a large climber, often with a trunk as thick as a man's body, covered with soft, thick, rugged bark. The milky juice which oozes from incisions separates, on standing in the open air, into a watery fluid and an elastic mass which has been used as a substitute for india-rubber. The greenish flowers are followed by twin roundish fruits with rough leathery skin, resembling oranges, and containing a tawny pulp which is eaten both by Europeans and by natives.

2. [l. c.] Eccles., same as cruet, 2.

urceolar (ėr-sē′ō-lär), a. [‹ urceolus + -ar[3].] Same as urceolate.

urceolareine, a. See urceolariine.

Urceolaria (ėr″sē-ō-lā′ri-ä), n. [NL. (Acharius, 1798), ‹ L. urceolus, a little pitcher (see urceolus), + -aria.] 1. In bot., a small genus of gymnocarpous lichens, having a uniform crustaceous thallus and urceolate apothecia (whence the name). U. scruposa and U. cinerea are used for dyeing.—2. [Lamarck, 1801.] In zoöl., the typical genus of Urceolariidæ, having the posterior circlet of cilia inclosing an adhesive disk. U. mitra is found in fresh water as a parasite of planarian worms.

urceolarian (ėr″sē-ō-lā′ri-an), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the family Urceolariidæ or having their characters.

II. n. An infusorian of this family.

Urceolariidæ (ėr″sē-ō-lā-rī′i-dē), n. pl. [‹ Urceolaria + -idæ.] A family of commensal or parasitic peritrichous infusorians, containing Urceolaria and a few other genera of fresh and salt water.

urceolariiform (ėr″sē-ō-lā′ri-i-fôrm), a. [‹ NL. Urceolaria + L. forma, form.] In bot., having the form of lichens of the genus Urceolaria.

urceolariine (ėr″sē-ō-lā′ri-in), a. In bot., of or pertaining to the genus Urceolaria. Also spelled urceolareine.

urceolate (ėr-sē′ō-lāt), a. [‹ urceolus + -ate[1].] 1. Shaped like a pitcher; swelling out like a pitcher as respects the body, and contracted at the orifice, as a calyx or corolla.—2. Provided with or contained in an urceolus, as a rotifer.

urceole (ėr′sē-ōl), n. [‹ L. urceolus: see urceolus, urceola.] Same as cruet, 2.

urceoli, n. Plural of urceolus.

Urceolina (ėr″sē-ō-lī′nä), n. [NL., from the shape of the flowers; dim. of L. urceolus, an urn: see urceolus.] A name given by Reichenbach in 1828 to Leperiza, a genus of plants, of the family Amaryllidaceæ. It is characterized by broadly tubular or urn-shaped flowers with short lobes, an ovary with numerous ovules, and stamens more or less winged at the base, but not united into a cup as in the related genera. The 3 species are natives of the Andes, and are bulbous plants with flat-petioled leaves, ovate-oblong or narrower, and umbels of numerous showy flowers, usually yellow and green. Leperiza urceolata and L. latifolia are border plants from Peru, known in cultivation as urn-flower, and by the name Urceolina. L. miniata, often called Pentlandia, is a very showy greenhouse plant, producing a solitary leaf and afterward an umbel of drooping vermilion flowers.

urceolus (ėr-sē′ō-lus), n.; pl. urceoli (-lī). [NL., ‹ L. urceolus, a little pitcher, dim. of urceus, a pitcher: see urceus.] 1. A little pitcher or ewer.—2. In bot., any pitcher- or urn-shaped body.—3. In zoöl., the external tubular casing or sheathing of a wheel-animalcule; the zoöthecium of a rotifer, corresponding to the lorica of an infusorian. It may be gelatinous and hyaline, or mixed with hard foreign particles; in rare cases, as that of Melicerta, the urceolus is not organic, but fabricated from extrinsic matter. Encyc. Brit., XXI. 5.

urceus (ėr′sē-us), n.; pl. urcei (-ī). [‹ L. urceus, a pitcher; cf. orca, a large vessel, Gr. ὑρχα, a pickle-jar.] Eccles., a ewer, usually of metal, to hold water for washing.

urchin (ėr′chin), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also urchon, urchone, urchyn; ‹ ME. urchin, urchon, urchone, urchoun, urchun, irchon, irchoun, hircheoune, ‹ OF. ireçon, ereçon, heriçon, herisson, herysson, F. hérisson = Pr. erisson = Sp. erizo = Pg. ericio, ouriço = It. riccio, ‹ L. ericio(n-),* ‹ ericius, a hedgehog, ‹ ēr, orig. hēr,* = Gr. χήρ, a hedgehog: see ericius.] I. n. 1. A hedgehog. See hedgehog and Erinaceus.

Rom. of the Rose, l. 3135.

The common hedgehog or urchin. Ray.

2. A sea-urchin.

The urchins of the sea called echini.
Holland, tr. of Pliny, ix. 31.

3†. An elf; a fairy: from the supposition that it sometimes took the form of a hedgehog.

Urchins
Shall, for that vast of night that they may work,
All exercise on thee. Shak., Tempest, i. 2. 326.

4. A roguish child; a mischievous boy.

I trowe the vrchyn will clyme
To some promocion hastely.
Roy and Barlow, Rede me and be nott Wrothe (ed. Arber, [p. 43).

Pleased Cupid heard, and checked his mother's pride,
"And who's blind now, mamma?" the urchin cried.
Prior, Venus Mistaken.

5. One of a pair of small cylinders covered with card-clothing, used in connection with the card-drum in a carding-machine. E. H. Knight.

II. a. 1. Elfish; mischievous. [Rare.]

Oft at eve [she]
Visits the herds along the twilight meadows,
Helping all urchin blasts and ill-luck signs
That the shrewd meddling elfe delights to make.
Milton, Comus, l. 845.

2†. Trifling; foolish.

Our Bishop . . . made himself merry with the conceit how easie it was to stride over such urchin articles. No man would find leisure to read the whole 36, they are so frivolous. Bp. Hacket, Abp. Williams, ii. 91. (Davies.) urchin-fish (ėr'chin-fish), n. A prickly globefish or sea-porcupine, Diodon hystrix, or a similar species. See cut under Diodon.

urchin-form (ėr'chin-fôrm), n. The form or type of form of a sea-urchin. Gegenbaur.

-urchon†, urchoun†, n. Obsolete forms of urchin.

urdé (ėr-dā'), a. [AF. urdee, ordé, pointed, < OHG. MHG. ort, a point, end, angle, edge, place, = AS. ME. ord, point of a sword, point: see ord.] In her.: (a) Having one or more extremities pointed bluntly, as by the lines bounding it making an angle of 90 degrees. (b) Having a single blunt-pointed projection from some part: as, a bend urdé, which has usually in the middle of the upper side a prominence ending in a blunt point. (c) Same as varriated. Also urdy, mately.

Urdu (ùr'dö), n. [Also Oordoo; = F. urdu, ourdou; < Hind. urdū, Hindustani, so named because it grew up since the eleventh century in the camps of the Mohammedan conquerors of India as a means of communication between them and the subject population of central Hindustan; prop. zabān-i-urdū, 'camp-language,' < urdū = Turk. ordū, ordī, ordā, a camp, < Pers. urdū, a court, camp, horde of Tatars, also ōrdū, whence ult. E. horde.] A native name for the present Hindustani tongue. See Hindustani. Also used adjectively.

urdy (ėr'di), a. In her., same as urdé.

ure1† (ūr), n. [< ME. ure, < OF. eure, uevre, ovre, F. œuvre, work, action, operation, = Sp. Pg. obra = It. opera, < L. opera, work: see opera, operate, and cf. inure, manure, manœuver.] Operation; use; practice.

And sure it is taken by custome and vre, Whyle yonge you be there is helpe and cure.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 348.

His Majesty could wish the ancient statutes were in ure of holding a parliament every year.
Bacon, Draft of King's Speech, 1614.

We will never from henceforth enact, put in ure, promulge, or execute any new canons, etc.
Act of Submission of Clergy to Henry VIII., in R. W. Dixon's Hist. Church of Eng., ii., note.

ure1† (ūr), v. t. and i. [< ure1, n.] To work; practise; inure; exercise. More.

ure2†, n. [< ME. ure, < OF. eur, eür, aür, F. heur (in bon-heur, mal-heur), fate, luck, fortune, F. also augure = Pr. agur = Sp. agüero = Pg. It. augurio, < L. augurium, augury: see augury. Doublet of augury.] Fortune; destiny.

Court of Love, l. 634.

ure3† (ūr), n. [< L. urus, a kind of wild bull: see urus.] The urus.

The third kind is of them that are named ures. Theis are of bignes somwhat lesse than elephantes, in kind and color and shape like a bull. Golding, Cæsar, fol. 163.

ure4†, pron. A Middle English form of our1.

ure5†, n. A Middle English form of hour.

ure6†, n. [< Ir. Gael. uir, mold, earth. Cf. urry.] Soil: as, an ill ure (a bad soil). [Scotch.]

ure7, n. See ewer3.

-ure. [F. -ure = Sp. Pg. It. -ura, < L. -ura, a term. of fem. nouns denoting employment or result. It is usually attached to the pp. stem of verbs, and the noun has the same form as the fem. of the future participle: examples are apertura, an opening, armatura, equipment, junctura, a joining, scriptura, a writing, textura, web, etc. In some E. words the termination -ure represents L. -atura (> OF. -eüre, > E. -ure), as in armure, now armour, armor, ult. identical with armature.] A termination of Latin origin, appearing in the formation of many nouns, as in aperture, armature, juncture, scripture, texture, fissure, pressure, etc. It is sometimes used as an English formative, as in wafture.

★urea (ū'rē-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. οὖρον, urine: see urine.] Carbamide, $CO.(NH_2)_2$, a crystalline solid, soluble in water, and forming crystalline compounds with both acids and bases. It is the final product of the proteid decomposition in the body, and forms the chief solid constituent of the urine of mammals. It appears also in the urine of birds.

ureal (ū'rē-ąl), a. [< urea + -al.] Of, relating to, or containing urea: as, a ureal solution.

ureameter (ū-rē-am'e-tėr), n. An apparatus for determining the amount of urea in the urine.

ureametry (ū-rē-am'e-tri), n. The quantitative test for urea in the urine.

ured†, a. [< ure2 + -ed2.] Fortunate.

In my selfe I me assured
That in my body I was wel ured.
The Isle of Ladies, l. 144.

Uredinales (ū-red-i-nā'lēz), n. pl. [NL. (Brongniart, 1824), < Uredo (-din-) + -ales.] An order of minute fungi, parasitic chiefly upon living flowering plants and ferns, and frequently very injurious to them. It includes the forms known chiefly as rusts. The order is remarkable for the peculiar alternation of forms undergone by many of the species, which are known as the æcidium form, uredoform, and teleutoform, and which were long considered as independent genera. Puccinia graminis, the so-called corn-mildew of England, may be taken as the type of the course of development followed by most Uredinales, the three form-genera Æcidium, Uredo, and Puccinia being different stages of it. The first or æcidium stage is the cluster-cup of the barberry; the second or uredoform is the red-rust of grain; and the third or Puccinia is the mature form. See Fungi, Puccinia, rust1, 3, mildew, Micropuccinia, Coniomycetes, heteræcism.—Tremelloid Uredinales, a group of Uredinales which do not possess æcidium or uredo forms, but consist of a teleutospore-bearing generation with usually softer and more gelatinous membranes. Also Uredineæ.

uredineous (ū-rē-din'ē-us), a. [< Uredineæ + -ous.] 1. Of or pertaining to the Uredinales. —2. Affected by uredo.

Uredines (ū-red'i-nēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Uredo.] In bot., the Uredinales.

uredinoid (ū-red'i-noid), a. In bot., resembling the Uredinales, or having their characters.

uredinous (ū-red'i-nus), a. Same as uredineous.

Uredo (ū-rē'dō), n. [NL. (Persoon, 1795), < L. uredo, a blight, a blast, < urere (√ us), kindle, burn: see ustion.] 1. A form-genus or stage in the development of fungi of the order Uredinales. It is the stage next preceding the final or Puccinia stage, until recently considered a distinct genus, and many forms whose complete life-history is unknown are for convenience still retained under this name. Compare cuts under Puccinia and spermogonium. 2. [l. c.] A receptacle or hymenium in which uredospores are produced.

uredoform (ū-rē'dō-fôrm), n. In bot., the form assumed by a uredineous fungus in the uredo condition—that is, that stage in which the uredospores are produced.

uredo-fruit (ū-rē'dō-früt), n. In bot., same as uredospore.

uredo-gonidium (ū-rē'dō-gō-nid'i-um), n. In bot., same as uredospore. [Little used.]

uredospore (ū-rē'dō-spōr), n. In bot., in Uredinales, the peculiar spore produced during the uredoform stage of the fungus. It is formed by acrogenous separation from a sterigma, and on germination produces a mycelium which bears uredospores or both uredospores and teleutospores. It is produced during the summer, and serves to reproduce and extend the fungus rapidly. See Puccinia, 1 (a) (with cut), heteræcism, and spore2.

uredosporic (ū-rē-dō-spor'ik), a. [< uredospore + -ic.] In bot., of or pertaining to a uredospore.

ureide (ū'rē-id or -īd), n. [< urea + -ide1.] A compound of urea with an acid radical. The ureides include a large number of urea-derivatives of very complex structure.

★uremia, uræmia (ū-rē'mi-ą), n. [NL. uræmia, < Gr. οὖρον, urine, + αἷμα, blood.] A condition resulting from the retention in the blood of waste products, chiefly urea, that should normally be eliminated by the kidneys. Its symptoms are mainly those of a nervous character, such as headache, nausea, delirium, and convulsions or somnolence followed by coma.

uremic, uræmic (ū-rē'mik), a. [< uremia + -ic.] Of or pertaining to uremia; causing uremia; affected with uremia: as, uremic convulsions.

Urena (ū-rē'ną), n. [NL. (Dillenius, 1732), < uren, its name in Malabar.] A genus of plants, of the family Malvaceæ, type of the tribe Ureneæ. It is characterized by flowers with five connate bractlets, and fruit everywhere roughened by minute hooks. There are about 6 species, known as Indian mallow, natives of tropical Asia or Africa, with one or two also widely dispersed through warm parts of America. They are herbs or shrubs, with usually angled or lobed leaves, and small yellowish flowers, commonly in sessile clusters. They are employed medicinally for their mucilaginous properties in India and elsewhere. In Brazil the flowers of U. lobata furnish an expectorant, and the roots and stems a decoction used for colic. U. lobata and U. sinuata, both common throughout the tropics, yield from their inner bark a useful fiber; that of the former, the guaxima of Brazil, makes a strong cordage and a good paper. At Penang the scentless leaves of U. lobata—there an abundant weed, known as perpulut—are collected, dried, and sold for mixing with patchouli, which they resemble.

Ureneæ (ū-rē'nē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Reichenbach, 1841), < Urena + -eæ.] A tribe of dicotyledonous plants, of the family Malvaceæ. It is characterized by flowers with ten styles, by the stamen-column being truncate or five-toothed at the top and externally anther-bearing below, and by five carpels, which separate at maturity. It includes 5 genera, mainly tropical herbs or shrubs. See Pavonia and Urena (the type).

ure-ox (ūr'oks), n. [< ure3 + ox.] The urus. J. T. White, Dict.

Urera (ū-rē'rą), n. [NL. (Gaudichaud, 1826), so called with ref. to the stinging hairs usually present; irreg. < L. urere, burn: see ustion.] A genus of plants, type of the subtribe Ureræ, of the order Urticaceæ. It is distinguished from the related genus Urtica by its baccate fruiting calyx. The 22 species are natives of tropical America, Africa, and islands of the Indian and Pacific Oceans. They are shrubs or small trees. A few are climbers, as U. elata of Jamaica, which is said to reach a height of 30 feet. They constitute, together with species of Pilea, the plants known as nettle in the West Indies, replacing there the genus Urtica. U. glabra (U. Sandwicensis), the opuhe of the Hawaiians, a small tree free from stinging hairs, yields a valuable fiber highly esteemed there for making fishing-nets. Several other species furnish fiber for ropes, as U. baccifera, a small prickly tree frequent from Cuba to Brazil, used medicinally in the West Indies as an aperient. U. tenax, a recently described South African species, yields a fiber resembling ramie.

uresis (ū-rē'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. οὐρησις, urination, < οὐρεῖν, urinate, < οὖρον, urine: see urine.] Urination; micturition.

uretal (ū-rē'tąl), a. Same as ureteric.

ureter (ū-rē'tėr), n. [< Gr. οὐρητήρ, the urethra, also one of the urinary ducts of the kidneys, < οὐρεῖν, urinate, < οὖρον, urine: see urine.] The excretory duct of the kidney; a tube conveying the renal excretion (urine) to the bladder, when that structure exists, as in mammals, or into the cloaca, in case no bladder exists—in any case, into the lower part of the allantoic cavity of the fetus, however modified in adult life. See cut under kidney. In man the ureter is a very slender tube, from 15 to 18 inches long, running from the pelvis of the kidney to the base of the bladder, at the posterior angle of the trigonum. It rests chiefly upon the psoas muscle, behind the peritoneum. Its structure includes a fibrous coat, longitudinal and circular muscular fibers, and a lining of mucous membrane, with vessels and nerves from various sources. The ureter pierces the wall of the bladder very obliquely, running for nearly an inch between the muscular and mucous coats of that viscus.

ureteral (ū-rē'tę-ral), a. Same as ureteric.

ureteric (ū-rē-tėr'ik), a. [< ureter + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a ureter.

ureteritis (ū-rē-tę-rī'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. οὐρητήρ, ureter, + -itis.] Inflammation of the ureter.

ureterolith (ū-rē'tėr-ō-lith), n. A urinary concretion formed or lodged in the ureter.

urethane, urethan (ū'rē-thān, -than), n. [< ur(ea) + eth(er) + -ane.] In chem., any ester of carbamic acid.—Ethyl urethane, $CO.NH_2.O.C_2H_5$, a white crystalline solid, somewhat used in medicine as a hypnotic.

★urethra (ū-rē'thrą), n.; pl. urethræ (-thrē). [= F. urèthre = Sp. uretra = Pg. urethra = It. uretra, < L. urethra, < Gr. οὐρήθρα, the passage for urine, < οὐρεῖν, urinate, < οὖρον, urine: see urine.] A modification of a part of a urogenital sinus into a tube or a groove for the discharge of the secretion of the genital or urinary organs, or both; in most mammals, including man, a complete tube from the bladder to the exterior, conveying urine and semen in the male sex, urine only in the female; in some birds, a penial groove for the conveyance of semen only. The urethra of the male is always a part of the penis, or a penial urethra, continuous usually with the urethral part of the urogenital sinus; that of the female is only exceptionally a part of the clitoris. In man the urethra extends from the neck of the bladder to the end of the penis, usually a distance of 8 or 9 inches. It is divided into three sections. The prostatic is that first section of the urethra which is embraced by the prostatic gland, 1¼ inches long, somewhat fusiform; upon its floor is a longitudinal ridge, the veru montanum or caput gallinaginis, on each side of which is a depression, the prostatic sinus, perforated by openings of the prostatic ducts. In advance of the veru is a median depression or cul-de-sac, variously known as the vesicula prostatica, vagina masculina, sinus pocularis, uterus masculinus, etc.; and the orifices of the ejaculatory ducts of the seminal vesicles open here. The membranous is that second section of the urethra, about ¾ inch long, which extends from the prostatic gland to the corpus spongiosum; it is contracted in caliber, perforates the deep perineal fascia, and is embraced by layers reflected from this fascia and by the specialized compressor urethræ muscle. The spongy section of the urethra extends from the membranous section to the end of the penis, being all that part of the urethra which is embraced by the penial corpus spongiosum. It is dilated at its beginning—this dilatation being sometimes specified as the bulbous section of the urethra, and further marked by the opening of the ducts of Cowper's glands—and at its end, within the glans penis, this terminal enlargement being the fossa navicularis. The urethra ends in a narrow vertical slit, the meatus urinarius. Numerous submucous follicles, the glands of Littré, open into the spongy section of the urethra; one of these openings forms a recess of considerable size, the lacuna magna. The substance of the urethra includes mucous, muscular, and erectile tissue. In the female the urethra is very short, about 1½ inches in length, and much more simple in structure and relations than that of the male.—Bulb of the urethra. See bulb.—Bulbous urethra, that part of the extent of the urethra which corresponds to its bulb. See bulb.—Crista urethræ. See crista.—Membranous urethra, the membranous section of the urethra. See def.—Penial urethra, a urethral groove or tube which forms part of the penis of any animal; in man, the spongy urethra.—Prostatic urethra, the prostatic section of the urethra. See def.—Spongy urethra, the spongy section of the urethra. See def.—Triangular ligament of the urethra. See triangular. Also called Camper's ligament and Carcassonne's ligament.

urethral (ū-rē′thral), a. [< urethra + -al.] Of or pertaining to the urethra.—Urethral crest. Same as crista urethræ (which see, under crista).—Urethral fever. See fever[1].

urethritic (ū-rē-thrit′ik), a. [< urethritis + -ic.] Affected with urethritis.

urethritis (ū-rē-thrī′tis), n. [NL., < urethra + -itis.] Inflammation of the urethra.

urethrocele (ū-rē′thrō-sēl), n. Protrusion of a part of the urethral wall through the meatus urinarius.

urethrometer (ū-rē-throm′e-tėr), n. An instrument for measuring the caliber of the urethra, and for locating and determining the degree of contraction of a stricture.

urethroplastic (ū-rē-thrō-plas′tik), a. [< urethroplast-y + -ic.] Of or pertaining to urethroplasty.

urethroplasty (ū-rē′thrō-plas-ti), n. [< Gr. οὐρήθρα, urethra, + πλαστός, < πλάσσειν, form, shape, mold: see plastic.] In surg., an operation for remedying defects in the urethra.

urethroscope (ū-rē′thrō-skōp), n. An instrument, somewhat resembling a catheter, through which, by means of a projected light, it is possible to see the mucous membrane lining the wall of the urethra.

urethroscopy (ū-rē′thrō-skō-pi), n. Inspection of the urethral mucous membrane by means of the urethroscope.

urethrotome (ū-rē′thrō-tōm), n. [< Gr. οὐρήθρα, urethra, + -τομος, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] In surg., an instrument for performing internal urethrotomy.

urethrotomic (ū-rē-thrō-tom′ik), a. [< urethrotom-y + -ic.] Of or pertaining to urethrotomy.

urethrotomy (ū-rē-throt′ō-mi), n. [< Gr. οὐρήθρα, urethra, + -τομία, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] In surg., cutting of the urethra, usually for the relief of stricture. External urethrotomy is division of the deep parts of the urethra by a knife passed through the perineum; internal urethrotomy is division of any part of the urethra by a cutting-instrument introduced through the meatus.

uretic (ū-ret′ik), a. [Also ouretic; < L. ureticus, < Gr. οὐρητικός, of or pertaining to urine, < οὐρεῖν, urinate, < οὖρον, urine: see urine.] In med., of or relating to or promoting the flow of urine.

urf (ėrf), n. A stunted, ill-grown child. [Scotch.]

Ye useless, weasel-like urf that ye are.
Hogg, The Brownie o' Bodsbeck.

urge (ėrj), v.; pret. and pp. urged, ppr. urging. [< L. urgere, press, push, force, drive, urge; perhaps akin to vergere, bend, turn, and Gr. εἴργειν (* ϝεεργειν), repress, constrain, εἰργύνναι, shut in, Skt. √ varj, wrench. Cf. verge[2] and wrick, wreak.] I. trans. 1. To press; impel; force onward.

Heir urges heir, like wave impelling wave.
Pope, Imit. of Hor., II. ii. 253.

Evening must usher night, night urge the morrow.
Shelley, Adonais, xxi.

2. To hasten laboriously; quicken with effort.

And there will want at no time who are good at circumstances; but men who set their minds on main matters, and sufficiently urge them in these most difficult times, I find not many. Milton, Free Commonwealth.

Through the thick deserts headlong urg'd his flight.
Pope, tr. of Statius's Thebaid, i.

3. To press the mind or will of; serve as a motive or impelling cause; impel; constrain; spur.

My tongue,
Urg'd by my heart, shall utter all the thoughts
My youth hath known. Beau. and Fl., Philaster, v. 5.

4. To press or ply hard with arguments, entreaties, or the like; request with earnestness; importune; solicit earnestly.

And when they urged him till he was ashamed, he said, Send. 2 Ki. ii. 17.

Urge the king
To do me this last right.
Shak., Hen. VIII., iv. 2. 157.

5. To press upon attention; present in an earnest manner; press by way of argument or in opposition; insist on; allege in extenuation, justification, or defense: as, to urge an argument; to urge the necessity of a case.

I never in my life
Did hear a challenge urged more modestly.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., v. 2. 53.

For God's sake, urge your faults no more, but mend!
Beau. and Fl., Coxcomb, v. 2.

6. To ply hard in a contest or an argument; attack briskly.

Every man has a right in dispute to urge a false religion with all its absurd consequences. Tillotson.

7†. To provoke; incite; exasperate.

Urge not my father's anger. Shak., T. G. of V., iv. 3. 27.

The Britans, urg'd and oppress'd with many unsufferable injuries, had all banded themselves to a generall revolt. Milton, Hist. Eng., ii.

II.† intrans. 1. To press on or forward.

He strives to urge upward. Donne.

2. To incite; stimulate; impel.

The combat urges, and my soul 's on fire.
Pope, Iliad, vi. 453.

3. To make a claim; insist; persist.

One of his men . . . urged extremely for 't, and showed what necessity belonged to 't. Shak., T. of A., iii. 2. 14.

4. To produce arguments or proofs; make allegations; declare.

I do beseech your lordships
That, in this case of justice, my accusers,
Be what they will, may stand forth face to face,
And freely urge against me.
Shak., Hen. VIII., v. 3. 48.

urge (ėrj), n. [< urge, v.] The act of urging; impulse. [Rare.]

Creation dumb, unconscious, yet alive
With some deep inward passion unexpressed,
And swift, concentric, never-ceasing urge.
R. W. Gilder, The Celestial Passion, Recognition.

urgence (ėr′jens), n. [< F. urgence = Sp. Pg. urgencia = It. urgenza; as urgen(t) + -ce.] Urgency. Heywood, Prologues and Epilogues (Works, ed. Pearson, 1874, VI. 356).

urgency (ėr′jen-si), n. [As urgence (see -cy).] The state or character of being urgent. Specifically—(a) Importunity; insistence; earnest solicitation: as, to yield to a person's urgency. (b) Pressure of necessity; imperativeness: as, the urgency of want or distress; the urgency of the occasion. (c) In the British Parliament, a formal declaration that a measure is urgent, in the interest of the state, and ought to receive prompt and early action, taking precedence of all other measures. Urgency may be declared by a vote of three to one in a house of not less than 300 members.

urgent (ėr′jent), a. [< F. urgent = Sp. Pg. It. urgente, < L. urgen(t-)s, ppr. of urgere, push, urge: see urge.] Having the character of urging, pressing, or constraining. Specifically—(a) Of things: Pressing; demanding immediate action; forcing itself upon notice; cogent; vehement: as, an urgent case or occasion. See urgency (c).

Please your highness
To take the urgent hour. Shak., W. T., i. 2. 465.

Which Jesus seeing, He upon him threw
The urgent yoak of an express Injunction.
J. Beaumont, Psyche, iii. 147.

He evaded the urgent demands of the Castilians for a convocation of cortes. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 25.

In ten minutes he had a second telegraphic message on its way, . . . one so direct and urgent that I should be sure of an answer to it.
O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 63.

(b) Of persons: Pressing with importunity. Ex. xii. 33.

However, Oedipus is almost out of his wits about the Matter, and is urgent for an account of Particulars.
Jeremy Collier, Short View (ed. 1698), p. 107.

urgently (ėr′jent-li), adv. In an urgent manner; with pressing importunity; insistently; pressingly; vehemently; forcibly.

urger (ėr′jėr), n. [< urge + -er[1].] One who urges or importunes. Fletcher, Valentinian, i. 3.

urgewonder† (ėrj′wun″dėr), n. A variety of barley.

This barley is called by some urgewonder.
Mortimer, Husbandry.

Urginea (ėr-jin′ē-ą), n. [NL. (Steinheil, 1834): said to be from the name of an Arab tribe of Algeria, where it was found.] A genus of liliaceous plants, of the tribe Scilleæ, including the officinal squill. It is distinguished from the type genus Scilla, in which it was formerly included, by its deciduous perianth, a three-angled capsule, and much-flattened seeds. It includes about 24 species, natives of Europe, Africa, and India, especially of the Mediterranean region. They are bulbous plants with linear or thong-like radical leaves, and an unbranched leafless scape bearing in a terminal raceme many small whitish flowers, rarely yellowish or pink, usually with a median band of deeper color along each segment. U. maritima, the officinal squill (see scilla, 2) or sea-onion, produces large bulbs inclosing many fleshy whitish layers, very acrid when fresh, but less so on drying: they are imported from the Mediterranean for medicinal use. U. altissima is similarly used in South Africa.

Urgonian (ėr-gō′ni-ąn), n. [< L. Urgo(n-), F. Orgon (see def.) + -ian.] A division of the Lower Cretaceous, according to the systematic nomenclature of the French and Belgian geologists. The typical Urgonian from Orgon, near Avignon (whence the name), is a massive limestone, in places developed to a thickness of over 1,000 feet, and containing an abundance of hippuritids and various other fossils.

Uria (ū′ri-ą), n. [NL. (Moehring, 1752; Brisson, 1760), < L. urinari, plunge under water, dive: see urinant, urinator.] A genus of Alcidæ; the guillemots and murres: used with various restrictions for any of the slender-billed birds of the auk family, as U. troile, the common foolish murre or guillemot, and U. grylle, the black guillemot. Since the genus Lomvia was instituted for the former, Uria has usually been restricted to the latter, in which sense it is otherwise called Cephus or Cepphus. See cuts under guillemot and murre.

uric (ū′rik), a. [= F. urique = Sp. Pg. urico, < NL. uricus*, < Gr. οὖρον, urine: see urine.] Of, pertaining to, or obtained from urine.—Uric acid, an acid, $C_5N_4H_4O_3$, characteristic of urine. It crystallizes in scales of various shapes of a brilliant white color and silky luster when pure, but in the urine the crystals are of a reddish-yellow color. It is inodorous and insipid, heavier than water, nearly insoluble in it when cold, and only to a slight extent dissolved by it when hot. The solution reddens litmus-paper, but feebly. When it is dissolved in nitric acid, and the solution is evaporated and treated with ammonia, a fine purple color is produced; by this reaction uric acid may be detected. It occurs in small quantity in the healthy urine of man and quadrupeds, but is the chief constituent in the urine of birds and reptiles; hence it is often found abundantly in Peruvian guano. It is normally present in small amount in the blood as urate, and it constitutes the principal proportion of some urinary calculi and of the concretions causing the complaint known as the gravel. Sometimes called lithic acid.

uricemia, uricæmia (ū-ri-sē′mi-ą), n. [NL. uricæmia, irreg. < uricus, uric, + Gr. αἷμα, blood.] Same as lithemia.

Uriconian (ū-ri-kō′ni-ąn), n. [< Uriconium (see def.) + -ian.] The name given by some English geologists to a series of volcanic rocks, of which the Wrekin, in Shropshire, England, is chiefly made up, and which is supposed to occupy a position very near the bottom of the fossiliferous series. The name is from the Roman station Uriconium, the site of the present village of Wroxeter, in Shropshire.

uridrosis (ū-ri-drō′sis), n. The excretion of certain urinary constituents, notably urea, in the sweat.

Uriinæ (ū-ri-ī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Uria + -inæ.] A subfamily of Alcidæ, named from the genus Uria; the murres and guillemots. Also Urinæ.

urile (ū′ril), n. A kind of cormorant, Phalacrocorax urile of Gmelin, or P. bicristatus of Pallas.

The fowl urile, of which there is great plenty in Kamtschatka. Kraschenninikoff, Kamtschatka (trans.), p. 157.

urim (ū′rim), n. pl. [< Heb. ūrīm, pl. of ūr, light, < ūr, shine.] Certain objects mentioned in the Old Testament, with the thummim (Ex. xxviii. 30, etc.) or alone (Num. xxvii. 21; 1 Sam. xxviii. 6), as connected with the rational, or breastplate of the Jewish high priest, and with oracular responses given by him. The true nature of the urim and thummim (literally 'lights and perfections') is not known. They seem to have been small objects kept inside the hoshen, or "breastplate," which was folded double, and many authorities believe them to have been precious stones or figures, used as lots or otherwise. There is no indication of their use after the time of David, and after the captivity they are alluded to as lost.

urinæmia, n. See urinemia.

urinal (ū′ri-nal), n. [< ME. urinal, urynal, orynal, < OF. urinal, orinal, F. urinal = Pr. urinal = Sp. orinal = Pg. ourinol = It. orinale, < ML. urinal, a urinal, orig. neut. of L. urinalis, of or pertaining to urine, < urina, urine: see urine.] 1. A vessel for containing urine, or a bottle in which it is kept for inspection.

These follies are within you and shine through you like the water in an urinal. Shak., T. G. of V., ii. 1. 41.

2. A convenience, public or private, for the accommodation of persons requiring to pass urine.

urinalist† (ū′ri-nal-ist), n. [< urinal + -ist.] One who by inspection of a patient's urine professed to determine the disease.

My urinalist . . . left no artery
Unstretcht upon the tenters.
Dekker, Match me in London, iii.

urinalysis (ū-ri-nal′i-sis), n. [Irreg. < L. urina, urine, + Gr. λύσις, loosing (cf. analysis).] Chemical examination of urine.

urinant (ū′ri-nant), a. [< L. urinan(t-)s, ppr. of urinari, dive, plunge under water, < urina, in the orig. sense 'water': see urine.] In her., being in the attitude of diving or plunging: noting a dolphin or fish when represented with the head down.

urinary (ū′ri-nā-ri), a. and n. [= F. urinaire = Sp. Pg. urinario = It. orinario, < ML. urinarius* (in neut. urinarium, a urinal), < L. urina, urine: see urine.] I. a. Of or pertaining to urine or the organs connected with the secretion and discharge of urine.—Urinary canal, a primitive urinary passage.—Urinary cast. Same as renal cast (which see, under cast[1]).—Urinary organs, the kidneys, bladder, ureters, and urethra of any higher vertebrate, as a reptile, bird, or mammal; the Wolffian bodies and ducts of any embryo vertebrate and of the adult of any of the lower vertebrates, as a fish; the organs, of whatever nature, concerned in the secretion and excretion of urine, or of any substance the removal of which from the system corresponds physiologically to the elimination of urea. Such are the organ of Bojanus of a mollusk, the segmental organs of worms, and the water-vascular system of a turbellarian. See urogenital and uropoietic.

II. n.; pl. urinaries (-riz). 1. In agri., a reservoir or place for the reception of urine, etc., for manure.—2. Same as urinal, 2.

urinate (ū′ri-nāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. urinated, ppr. urinating. [< ML. urinatus, pp. of urinare, urinate: see urine, v.] To discharge urine; micturate; make water.

urination (ū-ri-nā′shon), n. [< urinate + -ion.] The act of passing urine; micturition.—Precipitant urination, urination where the desire to pass urine is very sudden and imperative.

urinative (ū′ri-nā-tiv), a. [< urinate + -ive.] Provoking the flow of urine; diuretic.

Medicines urinative do not work by rejection and indigestion, as solutive do. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 43.

urinator (ū′ri-nā-tor), n. [< L. urinator, a diver, < urinari, dive, plunge under water: see urine, v.] 1. A diver; one who plunges and sinks in water, as in search of pearls. [Rare.]

Those relations of urinators belong only to those places where they have dived, which are only rocky. Ray.

2. [cap.] [NL. (Cuvier, 1800; Lacépède, 1801).] A genus of diving birds, giving name to the Urinatoridæ: variously applied. Quite recently the name was revived, and definitely restricted to the loons, whose usual generic name, Colymbus, was thereupon transferred to certain grebes. See Colymbus, and cuts under loon and tibia.

urinatorial (ū″ri-nā-tō′ri-al), a. [See urinator.] Of or pertaining to the Urinatoridæ; being or resembling one of the Urinatoridæ.

Urinatoridæ (ū″ri-nā-tor′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Urinator + -idæ.] A family of diving birds; the loons: same as Colymbidæ (b). When the loons are called Urinatoridæ, the grebes become ★Colymbidæ.

urine (ū′rin), n. [< ME. urine, < OF. urine, orine, F. urine = Pr. urina = Sp. orina = Pg. ourina = It. orina, urina = D. urine = G. Sw. Dan. urin, < L. urina, urine, in form as if fem. of urinus*, of water, < urum*, water, urine, = Gr. οὖρον, urine, orig. water, = Skt. vāri, vār, water, = Zend vāra, rain, = Icel. úr = Sw. ur- in ur-väder, drizzle, drizzling rain, = AS. wer, the sea.] An excrementitious fluid excreted by the kidneys, holding in solution most of the nitrogenous and other soluble products of tissue-change. Normal urine is of a clear amber or citron-yellow color, a brackish taste, a peculiar odor, a faintly acid reaction, and a specific gravity ranging from 1.015 to 1.025. Within the limits of health, however, it varies greatly in color, reaction, and density, according to the age, occupation, and diet of the individual, the time of day, and the season of the year. That passed in the morning upon rising is usually chosen for analysis, as presenting the average characteristics of the entire quantity excreted during the twenty-four hours. The average amount passed during this period is estimated at between three and four pints. The proportion of solid matters contained in every hundred parts of urine varies from three to seven parts or more, from 45 to 55 per cent. of which is urea, the rest being chlorid of sodium, phosphates, sulphates, ammonia, extractive matters, and uric acid. The chemical analysis of the urine and the microscopical examination of its sediment are important aids in the diagnosis and prognosis of many diseases. After its excretion in the cortical part of the kidney the urine passes at once through the ureters to the bladder, where it is held for a period and voided through the urethra at the will of the individual.

Retention of urine. See retention.—Smoky urine. See smoky.—Urine indican. Same as uroxanthin.

urine† (ū′rin), v. i. [< F. uriner = Sp. orinar = Pg. ourinar = It. orinare, < ML. urinare, make water, urine (in L. urinari, plunge under water, dive), < L. urina, urine (orig. water): see urine, n.] To discharge urine; urinate.

No oviparous animals which spawn or lay eggs do urine, except the tortoise. Sir T. Browne.

urinemia, urinæmia (ū-ri-nē′mi-ạ), n. [NL. urinæmia, < Gr. οὖρον, urine, + αἷμα, blood.] The contamination of the blood with urinary constituents.

uriniferous (ū-ri-nif′e-rus), a. [< L. urina, urine, + ferre = E. bear[1].] Conveying urine: as, uriniferous tubes or ducts.

urinific (ū-ri-nif′ik), a. [< L. urina, urine, + -ficus, < facere, make.] Secreting urine; uriniparous; uropoietic; urogenous.

uriniparous (ū-ri-nip′a-rus), a. [< L. urina, urine, + parere, produce.] In physiol., producing or preparing urine: specifically applied to certain tubes with this function in the cortical part of the kidney.

urinogenital (ū″ri-nō-jen′i-tal), a. [< L. urina, urine, + genitalis, genital.] Same as urogenital.

urinogenitary (ū″ri-nō-jen′i-tā-ri), a. [As urinogenit(al) + -ary.] Same as urogenital.

These plexuses are distributed on the enteric tube, and on all the organs derived from it, as also on the vascular system and urino-genitary organs.

urinology (ū-ri-nol′ō-ji), n. [< Gr. οὖρον, urine, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The scientific study of the constitution of the urine, with special reference to the diagnostic significance of changes in its composition and appearance.

urinometer (ū-ri-nom′e-tėr), n. [< L. urina, urine, + Gr. μέτρον, measure.] An instrument for ascertaining the specific gravity of urine. It is constructed upon the principle of the common hydrometer.

urinometric (ū″ri-nō-met′rik), a. [As urinometry + -ic.] Determining the specific gravity of urine by means of the urinometer; of or pertaining to urinometry.

urinometry (ū-ri-nom′e-tri), n. [< L. urina, urine, + Gr. -μετρία, < μέτρον, measure.] The determination of the specific gravity of urine; the scientific use of the urinometer.

urinoscopic (ū″ri-nō-skop′ik), a. [< urinoscop-y + -ic.] Pertaining to the inspection of urine in the diagnosis and treatment of disease. Also uroscopic.

urinoscopy (ū′ri-nō-skō-pi), n. [< Gr. οὖρον, urine, + -σκοπία, < σκοπεῖν, view.] Inspection or examination of urine in the diagnosis and treatment of disease. Also uroscopy.

urinose (ū′ri-nōs), a. [< NL. urinosus*, urinous: see urinous.] Same as urinous. Ray, Works of Creation, ii.

urinous (ū′ri-nus), a. [< F. urineux, < NL. urinosus*, < L. urina, urine: see urine.] Pertaining to urine, or partaking of its properties.

urion (ū′ri-on), n. [Mex.] One of sundry burrowing quadrupeds, as the marmot-squirrel of Mexico, Spermophilus mexicanus.

urite (ū′rit), n. [< Gr. οὐρά, tail, + -ite[2].] The sternite, or sternal sclerite, of any abdominal or postabdominal segment of an insect; the ventral section of any uromere; originally, the whole of any primary abdominal segment; a uromere. Lacaze-Duthiers.

urjoon (ėr′jön), n. An Indian plant, Terminalia Arjuna. See Terminalia[2].

urlar (ėr′lär), n. See pibroch.

urle (ėrl), n. In her., same as orle. [Rare.]

urman (ėr′man), n. In parts of Siberia, an extensive tract of coniferous forest, especially a swampy forest: a Tatar word closely allied in meaning to the word cedar-swamp as used in parts of the (United States) Upper Lake region.

Impenetrable forests and quivering marshes—the dreadful urmans, which are penetrated by man only for some 20 to 50 miles around the widely separated settlements.
Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 429.

★urn (ėrn), n. [< ME. urne, < OF. (and F.) urne = Sp. Pg. It. urna, < L. urna, a jar, vase; prob. not from urere, burn, but cognate with urceus, Gr. ὑρχα, etc.: see urceus.] 1. A kind of vase having an oviform or rounded body with a foot; by extension (since the ashes of the dead were formerly put into such vessels), any receptacle for the dead body or its remains.

A vessell that men clepeth an urne,
Of gold. Chaucer, Troilus, v. 311.

Two urns by Jove's high throne have ever stood,
The source of evil one, and one of good.
Pope, Iliad, xxiv. 663.

Storied urn and animated bust. Gray, Elegy.

2. A place of burial; a grave. [Rare.]

The most noble corse that ever herald
Did follow to his urn. Shak., Cor., v. 6. 146.

3. A Roman measure for liquids, containing one half the amphora.—4. A tea-urn.—5. In bot., the hollow vessel in which the spores of mosses are produced; the sporogonium or sporecase; the theca. See cut under moss.—6. In the Dicyemida, specifically, a cup-like part of the infusoriform embryo of a rhombogenous dicyemid, consisting of a capsule, a lid, and contents. See Dicyemida, and cut under Dicyema.—Cinerary urn. See cinerary.

urn (ėrn), v. t. [< urn, n.] To inclose in an urn, or as in an urn; inurn.

When horror universal shall descend,
And heaven's dark concave urn all human race.
Young.

urnal (ėr′nal), a. [< L. urnalis, of or pertaining to an urn, < urna, an urn: see urn.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling an urn.

Urnal interments and burnt relics lie not in fear of worms. Sir T. Browne, Urn-burial, iii.

urn-flower (ėrn′flou″ėr), n. See Urceolina.

urnful (ėrn′fůl), a. [< urn + -ful.] As much as an urn will hold; enough to fill an urn.

urn-shaped (ėrn′shāpt), a. Having the shape of an urn.

Uroaëtus (ū-rō-ā′e-tus), n. [NL. (Kaup, 1844, and Uraëtus, 1845), < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + ἀετός, an eagle.] A genus of Australian and Tasmanian eagles, with one species, U. audax, the so-called bald vulture of Latham (1801) and the mountain-eagle of Collins (1804). This eagle is 38 inches long, with the wing 24 inches. When adult it is of a general black color, varied on the nape with chestnut and on the wings and tail with whitish. The bill is 3 inches long, of a horn-color blackening at the tip, the cere and lores are yellowish, the feet are light-yellow, and the irides are hazel.

urobilin (ū-rō-bil′in), n. [< Gr. οὖρον, urine, + L. bilis, bile, + -in[2].] A coloring matter found usually in small quantities in normal urine, but often present in large amount in this fluid in cases of fever. It is derived from the bile-pigments.

urobilinuria (ū-rō-bil-i-nū′ri-ạ), n. [< urobilin + Gr. οὖρον, urine.] A condition in which a large percentage of urobilin, formed from the bile-pigments, is present in the urine.

urocardiac (ū-rō-kär′di-ak), a. [< Gr. οὐρά, tail, + καρδία, the heart: see cardiac.] Noting certain calcifications of the posterior or prepyloric part of the cardiac division of the stomach of some crustaceans, as the crawfish: correlated with uropyloric. See cut under Astacidæ. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 319.—Urocardiac process, a strong calcified process which extends backward and downward from the cardiac plate of the stomach of the crawfish, and which articulates with the prepyloric ossicle.—Urocardiac tooth, a strong bifid process which extends downward from the lower end of the prepyloric ossicle of the crawfish's stomach.

Urocerata (ū-rō-ser′a-tạ), n. pl. [NL. (Latreille), < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + κέρας, horn.] A division of securiferous terebrant Hymenoptera, contrasted with Tenthredinidæ, and corresponding to the modern family Urocerida (or Siricidæ). See Urocerida.

Uroceridæ (ū-rō-ser′i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Leach, 1817), < Urocerus + -idæ.] A family of phytophagous hymenopterous insects; the horntails, auger-flies, or Siricidæ, named from the genus Urocerus. They are distinguished from the saw-flies (Tenthredinidæ), which they most nearly resemble, by the fact that the female abdomen is furnished at the tip with a borer, and not with a pair of saws. The males may be distinguished by the single apical fore-tibial spur (the Tenthredinidæ having two-spurred front tibiæ). The family is not rich in genera and species, but is of wide distribution, and contains many striking forms. Four genera and 12 species occur in Europe, and the same number of genera and 40 species in North America. The pigeon-tremex, Tremex columba, is an example. Also Urocerata, Uroceratæ, and Urocerides. The family is called Siricidæ in Europe, Uroceridæ being held by American hymenopterists.

Urocerus (ū-ros′e-rus), n. [NL. (Geoffroy, 1764), < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + κέρας, horn.] A genus of horntails, typical of the family Uroceridæ, and distinguished by the exserted ovipositor, short neck, and fore wings with two marginal and three submarginal cells. They are sometimes called tailed wasps. Sirex (Linnæus, 1767) is a synonym.

urochord (ū′rō-kôrd), n. [< Gr. οὐρά, tail, + χορδή, a chord.] 1. The caudal chord of an ascidian or tunicate, likened to the notochord, chorda dorsalis, or dorsal chord of a vertebrate; the central axis of the appendage of certain adult tunicates, as an appendicularian, and the corresponding structure of embryonic or larval tunicates in general. It is considered to represent the primordial spinal column of a vertebrate, and to indicate the affinity of the Tunicata with the Vertebrata. See Chordata, Urochorda, Vertebrata, and cut under Appendicularia. Also urocord.

2. Any member of the Urochorda. Bell, Comp. Anat., p. 313.

Urochorda (ū-rō-kôr′dạ̈), n. pl. [NL.: see urochord.] The tunicates or ascidians regarded as a branch of Chordata, correlated with Hemichorda, Cephalochorda, and Craniata: same as Ascidia, 1: so called from the possession, permanently or transiently, of a urochord. The Urochorda have been divided into Larvalia and Saccata, the latter including the true ascidians, salps, and doliolids, the former the Appendiculariidæ. The same divisions are also named Perennichordata and Caducichordata. See cuts under Ascidia, Appendicularia, Doliolidæ, Salpa, and Tunicata.

urochordal (ū-rō-kôr′dạl), a. [< urochord + -al.] Provided with a urochord; urochordate; of or pertaining to the urochord or the Urochorda. Compare notochordal, parachordal.

urochordate (ū-rō-kôr′dāt), a. [< urochord + -ate[1].] Having a urochord, as an ascidian; belonging to the Urochorda.

Urochroa (ū-rok′rō-ạ̈), n. [NL. (Gould, 1856), < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + χρόα, color.] A genus of humming-birds, with one species, U. bougueri of Ecuador, having a straight bill much longer than the head, and wings reaching almost to the end of the nearly square tail, whose feathers are pointed. It is a large hummer, 5¼ inches long, the bill 1¼ inches, the wing 2¾, the tail 2. The upper parts are grass-green, bronzed on the rump; the throat and breast are dark metallic-blue and the flanks shining-green; the wings are purplish; the middle tail-feathers are dark-green, but the others are white, edged with blackish, and hence of conspicuous coloration (whence the name).

urochrome (ū′rō-krōm), n. [< Gr. οὐρον, urine, + χρῶμα, color.] A yellow pigment of the urine.

urochs (ū′roks), n. Same as aurochs.

Urocichla (ū-rō-sik′lạ̈), n. [NL. (Sharpe, 1881), < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + κίχλη, a thrush.] A genus of wrens or wren-like birds, with one species, U. longicaudata, of the Khasia Hills and other hills of India. It is 4½ inches long, the wing and tail each about 2 inches, and of dark-olive and rusty-brown coloration, varied in some parts with whitish streaks.

Red-billed Tree-jay (Urocissa erythrorhyncha).

Urocissa (ū-rō-sis′ạ̈), n. [NL. (Cabanis, 1850), < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + κίσσα, the magpie.] A genus of Asiatic Corvidæ, with very long and much-graduated tail, like a magpie's, the central feathers long-exserted, the wings short, the head crestless and without wattles, and the bill stout. Four species range from the Himalayan region into Burma, Siam, and China: U. occipitalis, U. magnirostris, U. erythrorhyncha (the red-billed jay and black-headed roller of Latham, with a coralline beak), and U. flavirostris (yellow-billed); a fifth, U. cærulea, inhabits Formosa. They are large handsome jays, 20 to 24 inches long, of which the tail is a foot or more. Blue is the leading color. See cut in preceding column.

Urocyon (ū-ros′i-on), n. [NL. (S. F. Baird, 1857), < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + κύων, dog, = E. hound.] A genus of canine quadrupeds, of which the common gray fox of the United States, Urocyon virginianus, is the type, closely related in most respects to Canis and Vulpes. The name is derived from a peculiarity of the hairs of the tail; but more important characters subsist in certain cranial bones, particularly the shape of the angle of the lower jaw-bone. The genus includes the coast-fox of California, U. littoralis. See also cut under Canidæ.

urocyst (ū′rō-sist), n. [< NL. urocystis, < Gr. οὐρον, urine, + κύστις, bladder: see cyst.] The permanently pervious part of the cavity of the allantois of a mammal, for the reception and detention of urine; the urinary bladder; the cystic vesicle.

urocystic (ū-rō-sis′tik), a. [< urocyst + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the urinary bladder; cystic; vesical.

urocystis (ū-rō-sis′tis), n.; pl. urocystes (-tēz). [NL.: see urocyst.] 1. Same as urocyst.—2. [cap.] A genus of ustilagineous fungi, containing several very destructive species, as U. Cepulæ, the smut of onions, U. anemones on Ranunculaceæ, etc. See onion-smut.

Urodela (ū-rō-dē′lạ̈), n. pl. [NL. (orig. F. pl. urodèles, Duméril), neut. pl. of urodelus*: see urodele.] An order of Amphibia; the tailed amphibians; the ichthyomorphic amphibians, which retain the tail throughout life, as distinguished from the Anura, or tailless batrachians. They have a naked skin, and may or may not retain gills as well as tail, being thus either perennibranchiate or caducibranchiate. The salamanders, sirens, efts, newts, tritons, etc., are urodele. Equivalent names are Caudata, Ichthyomorpha, Saurobatrachia. See cuts under axolotl, hellbender, Menobranchus, newt, Proteus, salamander, Salamandra, and Spelerpes.

urodelan (ū-rō-dē′lạn), a. and n. [< urodele + -an.] Same as urodele.

urodele (ū′rō-dēl), a. and n. [< NL. urodelus*, < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + δῆλος, manifest.] I. a. Tailed, as an amphibian; not anurous, as a batrachian; retaining the tail throughout life, as a salamander, newt, or eft; belonging to the Urodela.

II. n. Any member of the Urodela.

urodelian (ū-rō-dē′li-ạn), a. [< urodele + -ian.] Same as urodèle.

urodelous (ū-rō-dē′lus), a. [< urodele + -ous.] Same as urodele.

urodialysis (ū″rō-dī-al′i-sis), n. A partial suppression of urine.

uroërythrin (ū-rō-er′i-thrin), n. [< Gr. οὖρον, urine, + E. erythrin.] A pigment which imparts the salmon-red color to urinary sediments composed of urates. It is seen especially in fevers.

Urogalba (ū-rō-gal′bạ̈), n. [NL. (Bonaparte, 1854), < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + NL. Galb(ul)a.] The paradise or swallow-tailed jacamars, a genus of birds of the family Galbulidæ. They have the characters of Galbula proper, but the middle tail-feathers are long-exserted. U. paradisea is the best-known species. It is 11½ inches long, purplish-black bronzed on the wings and tail, with white throat and brown cap. It inhabits tropical America. See cut in next column.

Paradise Jacamar (Urogalba paradisea).

Urogallus (ū-rō-gal′us), n. [NL. (Scopoli, 1777), < urus, bull, + gallus, a cock.] A genus of grouse: a synonym of Tetrao, and now the specific name of the capercaillie, Tetrao urogallus. See cut under capercaillie.

urogaster (ū-rō-gas′tèr), n. [< Gr. οὖρον, urine, + γαστήρ, stomach.] The urinary intestine, or urinary passages collectively, which are developed from the original cavity of the allantois in connection with the primitive intestinal tract. It is that part of the allantoic cavity which continues pervious, with the passages connected with it (if there are any) subsequently developed. Compare peptogaster.

urogastric (ū-rō-gas′trik), a. [< urogaster + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to the urogaster.—2. Of or pertaining to the posterior pair of divisions of the gastric lobe of the dorsal surface of the carapace of a crab. Huxley.

urogenital (ū-rō-jen′i-tạl), a. and n. [< Gr. οὖρον, urine, + L. genitalis, genital.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the urinary and genital organs; urinogenital. Also urinogenital, urinogenitary, genito-urinary.—Urogenital canal, the urethra.—Urogenital sinus. See sinus.

II. n. A urogenital organ.

urogenous (ū-roj′e-nus), a. [< Gr. οὖρον, urine, + L. -genus, producing: see -gen.] Secreting or producing urine; uropoietic; uriniparous.

uroglaucin (ū-rō-glâ′sin), n. [< Gr. οὖρον, urine, + γλαυκός, bluish-green.] A blue pigment demonstrable in urine by treating with a mineral acid and an oxidizing agent; indigo-blue.

★urohyal (ū-rō-hī′ạl), a. and n. [< Gr. οὐρά, tail, + E. hy(oid) + -al.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the urohyal.

II. n. In ornith., the tail-piece of the composite hyoid bone; the median azygous backward-projecting element of that bone, borne upon the basihyal; the basibranchial element, or base of the first branchial arch.

Urolestes (ū-rō-les′tēz), n. [NL. (Cabanis, 1850), < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + λῃστής, a robber: see Lestes.] A monotypic genus of African shrikes, Urolestes melanoleucus.

of the family Laniidæ, related to the fiscal shrikes. All the feathers of the head and neck are lanceolate, and the tail is long and much graduated, with the median rectrices long-exserted and more than twice as long as the wing. U. melanoleucus of southern and eastern Africa is glossy black and white, and 19 inches long, of which the tail is 13 inches; the wing is only 5½. The resemblance of this shrike to a magpie is striking.

urolithiasis (ū″rō-li-thī′ā-sis), n. Same as lithiasis (a).

urological (ū-rō-loj′i-kal), a. [< urolog-y + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to urology.

urologist (ū-rol′ō-jist), n. [< urolog-y + -ist.] One who is versed in urology. Lancet, No. 3433, p. 1216.

urology (ū-rol′ō-ji), n. [< Gr. οὖρον, urine, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] Same as urinology.

uromancy (ū′rō-man-si), n. Diagnosis and prognosis of disease by inspection of the urine.

Uromastix (ū-rō-mas′tiks), n. [NL. (Merrem), < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + μάστιξ, whip, scourge.] A genus of agamoid lizards; the thorn-tailed agamas, having the tail ringed with spinose scales. Several species inhabit Europe, Asia, and Africa. Also Mastigurus.

uromelanin (ū-rō-mel′a-nin), n. [< Gr. οὖρον, urine, + μέλας (μελαν-), black.] A black pigment found in the urine especially in cases of melanotic sarcoma.

uromelus (ū-rom′e-lus), n.; pl. uromeli (-lī). [NL., < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + μέλος, a limb.] In teratol., a monster having the lower limbs united and terminating in a single foot; sympus.

uromere (ū′rō-mēr), n. [< Gr. οὐρά, tail, + μέρος, part.] A caudal or posterior segment of the body; a urosomite; any abdominal segment of an arthropod. See urosome. A. S. Packard.

uromeric (ū-rō-mer′ik), a. [< uromere + -ic.] Of the nature of or pertaining to a uromere.

urometer (ū-rom′e-tėr), n. Same as urinometer.

Uromyces (ū-rom′i-sēz), n. [NL. (Link, 1816), < Gr. οὐρά, a tail, + μύκης, a mushroom.] A genus of uredineous fungi, having the teleutospores separate, unicellular, pedunculate, and produced in flat sori. About 250 species have been described.

Uropeltidæ (ū-rō-pel′ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Uropeltis + -idæ.] A family of cylinder-snakes or tortricoid ophidians, typified by the genus Uropeltis, having no rudiments of hind limbs, and the tail of variable character according to the genus; the roughtails. The family is also called Rhinophidæ. There are 7 genera.

Uropeltis (ū-rō-pel′tis), n. [NL. (Cuvier), < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + πέλτη, a shield.] A genus of serpents, giving name to the family Uropeltidæ.

urophaëin (ū-rō-fā′ē-in), n. A pigment-body contained in the urine, to the presence of which the characteristic odor of this fluid has been attributed.

urophthisis (ū-rō-thī′sis), n. Diabetes mellitus. [Rare.]

uroplania (ū-rō-plā′ni-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. οὖρον, urine, + πλανᾶν, wander: see planet.] The occurrence or presence of urine anywhere in the body where it does not belong. Compare uremia, uridrosis.

uroplatoid (ū-rō-plā′toid), a. [< NL. Uroplates + -oid.] Of or pertaining to the Uroplatoidea.

Uroplatoidea (ū″rō-plā-toi′dē-ą), n. pl. [NL., < Uroplates (the type genus) + -oidea.] A superfamily of eriglossate lacertilians, represented by a family Uroplatidæ alone, having biconcave vertebræ, clavicles not dilated proximally, and no postorbital or postfrontal squamosal arches. T. Gill, Smithsonian Report, 1885.

uropod (ū′rō-pod), n. [< Gr. οὐρά, tail, + πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] Any abdominal limb of an arthropod; an appendage of the urosome. A. S. Packard.

Uropoda (ū-rop′ō-dą), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1806): see uropod.] A genus of parasitic mites, of the family Gamasidæ, having an excremental cord of varying length which attaches each individual to its host. They are parasitic upon various beetles. U. americana is commonly found clustering upon the Colorado potato-beetle, Doryphora decemlineata.

uropodal (ū-rop′ō-dal), a. [< uropod + -al.] Of the character of a uropod; pertaining to uropods: as, uropodal appendages.

uropoësis, uropoïesis (ū-rō-pō-ē′sis, -poi-ē′sis), n. 1. The formation of urine; the excretion of urine or of its constituents from the blood, and its elimination from the body: noting the function of the uropoietic organs and its result. —2. The act of voiding urine; micturition; urination.

uropoietic (ū″rō-poi-et′ik), a. [< Gr. οὖρον, urine, + ποιητικός, doing, < ποιεῖν, make, do. Cf. chylopoietic.] In anat. and physiol., secreting or excreting urine; urinific; uriniparous; urogenous: noting urinary or uriniparous organs or their function: as, the uropoietic system; the uropoietic viscera. The epithet is applicable not only to the kidneys, but to associated structures, as the renportal venous system, and also to the representative urinary organs, often very different, of those animals which have no true kidneys, as the Wolffian bodies of the lower invertebrates, and the water-vascular system of various invertebrates.

uropsammus (ū-rop-sam′us), n. Urinary gravel.

uropsile (ū-rop′sil), n. [< Uropsilus.] A shrew-like animal of the genus Uropsilus.

Uropsilus (ū-rop′si-lus), n. [NL. (A. Milne-Edwards, 1872), < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + ψιλός, bare, smooth.] A genus of terrestrial shrew-moles, of the family Talpidæ and subfamily Myogalinæ. The fore feet are neither fossorial nor natatorial; there are 2 incisors, 1 canine, 3 premolars, and 3 molars in each upper half-jaw, and 1 incisor, 1 canine, 3 premolars, and 3 molars in each lower half-jaw. The type, U. soricipes of Tibet, combines the external form of a shrew with cranial characters of a mole.

Uropygi (ū-rō-pī′jī), n. pl. A suborder of pedipalp arachnidans, characterized by a long tail-like postabdomen, and including the true whip-scorpions, as the Thelyphonidæ: contrasted with Amblypygi. See cut under Pedipalpi, and compare that under Phrynida.

uropygial (ū-rō-pij′i-ąl), a. [< uropygium + -al.] In ornith., of or pertaining to the uropygium or rump: as, uropygial feathers.—Uropygial gland. See gland, and cut under elæodochon.

uropygium (ū-rō-pij′i-um), n.; pl. uropygia (-ą). [NL., < Gr. οὐροπύγιον, another reading of ὀρροπύγιον, the rump of birds, < ὄρρος, rump (οὐρά, tail), + πυγή, rump, buttocks.] In ornith., the rump; the terminal section of the body, represented by the caudal vertebræ, into which the tail-feathers are inserted; also, the upper surface of this part, or terminal section of the notæum, with limits not defined. See cuts under bird[1] and elæodochon.

uropyloric (ū″rō-pī-lor′ik), a. [< Gr. οὐρά, tail, + NL. pylorus: see pyloric.] Of or pertaining to the posterior part of the pyloric division of the stomach of certain crustaceans, as the crawfish: as, a uropyloric ossicle: correlated with urocardiac. Huxley.

urorrhagia (ū-rō-rā′ji-ą), n. Excessive micturition; diabetes.

urorrhea, urorrhœa (ū-rō-rē′ą), n. Involuntary passage of urine; enuresis.

urosacral (ū-rō-sā′kral), a. and n. [< Gr. οὐρά, tail, + NL. sacrum: see sacral.] I. a. Situated between the sacrum and the coccyx; of or pertaining both to the sacrum and to the coccyx: as, the urosacral region. The term is specifically applied to the numerous equivocal vertebræ of the sacrarium of a bird, which are situated between the sacral vertebræ proper and the free caudal or coccygeal vertebræ, and are ankylosed with one another, with the last true sacral vertebra, and to a greater or less extent with the ilia or ischia, or both.

II. n. In ornith., any vertebra of the urosacral region; any vertebra between the last true sacral and the first free caudal. See cuts under sacrarium and sacrum.

urosacrum (ū-rō-sā′krum), n.; pl. urosacra (-krą). [NL., < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + NL. sacrum, q. v.] That posterior part of a bird's compound sacrarium which is formed of urosacral or false coccygeal bones ankylosed together and with the sacrum proper. See cuts under sacrarium and sacrum.

Urosalpinx (ū-rō-sal′pingks), n. [NL. (W. Stimpson, 1865), < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + σάλπιγξ, a trumpet.] A genus of gastropods, of the family Muricidæ, having a fusiform shell with radiating undulations or folds. U. cinerea, known as the drill or borer, is very destructive to oysters, whose shell it perforates, making a small round hole by means of its tongue. See drill[1], 5.

Drill or borer (Urosalpinx cinerea), enlarged one half.

uroscopic (ū-rō-skop′ik), a. [< uroscop-y + -ic.] Same as urinoscopic.

uroscopist (ū′rō-skō-pist), n. One who makes a specialty of urinary examinations; one who practises uromancy.

Actuarius, the Uroscopist of the Byzantine court, described in the minutest detail the visible changes of urine in health and in disease.
Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, VII. 403.

uroscopy (ū′rō-skō-pi), n. [< Gr. οὖρον, urine, + -σκοπία, < σκοπεῖν, view.] Same as urinoscopy.

urosis (ū-rō′sis), n. A disease of the urinary organs.

urosomatic (ū″rō-sō-mat′ik), a. [< urosome (-somat-) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the urosome; consisting of urosomites, as the segments of a lobster's abdomen.

urosome (ū′rō-sōm), n. [< Gr. οὐρά, tail, + σῶμα, body.] In biol.: (a) The last morphological segment of the tail; the terminal somatome of a vertebrate. See gephyrocercal. (b) The post-thoracic region of the body of arthropods; the abdomen or postabdomen as distinguished from the cephalothorax, and as composed of a series of urosomites or uromeres.

urosomite (ū-rō-sō′mīt), n. [< Gr. οὐρά, tail, + E. somite.] One of the somites, segments, or rings of the urosome; a uromere.

urosomitic (ū″rō-sō-mit′ik), a. [< urosomite + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a urosomite; uromeric.

Urospermum (ū-rō-spėr′mum), n. [NL. (Scopoli, 1777), so called from the appendaged achenes; < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + σπέρμα, seed.] A genus of composite plants, of the family Cichoriaceæ and tribe Scorzovereæ. It is distinguished from the related genus Scorzonera by an involucre of a single row of bracts and by achenes with a dilated and hollow beak. The two species are natives of the Mediterranean region; one, U. picroides, also occurs, perhaps introduced, in South Africa. They are annuals or biennials, hairy or bristly, with radical or alternate deeply cut leaves, and yellow flowers sometimes with a spiny involucre. The flower-heads become greatly enlarged in fruit, terminating long swollen hollow branches; the achenes are long and often incurved, with a long hollow appendage or stalk below in addition to the elongated beak, which bears a soft plumose pappus. See sheep's-beard.

urostealith (ū-rō-stē′a-lith), n. [< Gr. οὖρον, urine, + στέαρ, fat, tallow, + λίθος, stone.] A fatty matter occasionally found in urinary concretions, but very rarely composing the entire calculus. It is saponifiable in caustic potash, and soluble in alcohol and ether. It burns with a yellow flame, evolving an odor of shellac and benzoin, and when unmixed with other matters leaves no residue.

urostegal (ū′rō-stē-gal), a. and n. [< urostege + -al.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the urosteges; being one of the urosteges.

II. n. A urostege or urostegite.

urostege (ū′rō-stēj), n. [< Gr. οὐρά, tail, + στέγη, a roof.] In herpet., one of the large special scales or scutes, generally alternating or two-rowed, which cover the under side of the tail of a snake, as the gastrosteges cover the abdomen. The number and disposition of the urosteges furnish zoölogical characters in many cases. Compare gastrostege.

urostegite (ū′rō-stē-jīt), n. [< urostege + -ite[2].] One of the urosteges, or urostegal scales.

urosteon (ū-ros′tē-on), n. [NL., < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + ὀστέον, bone.] A median posterior ossification of the sternum of some birds, as Dicholophus cristatus, arising from an independent ossific center. W. K. Parker.

urosternite (ū-rō-stėr′nīt), n. [< Gr. οὐρά, tail, + E. sternite.] The sternite, or ventral median sclerite, of any somite of the urosome of an arthropod. Compare urite. A. S. Packard.

urosthene (ū′ros-thēn), n. [< Gr. οὐρά, tail, + σθένος, strength.] In zoöl., an animal whose greatest strength is in the tail; an animal whose organization is comparatively large and strong in the caudal region of the body, as a cetacean or a sirenian.

urosthenic (ū-ros-then′ik), a. [< urosthene + -ic.] Strong in the tail, or caudal region of the body: said of an animal whose organization preponderates in size and strength in the hinder part of the body: opposed to prosthenic.

Urosticte (ū-rō-stik′tē), n. [NL. (Gould, 1853).] A genus of humming-birds, with 2 Ecuadorian species, E. benjamini and E. ruficrissa, of small size, 3¼ inches long, the bill ⅞ to ¾ of an inch, the tail emarginate, and the gorget luminous green with or without a violet spot, the general plumage green. They are known as white-tips.

urostylar (ū-rō-stī′lär), a. [< urostyle + -ar[3].] Of the nature of or pertaining to a urostyle. as, a urostylar bone or process.

urostyle (ū′rō-stīl), n. [< Gr. οὐρά, tail, + στῦλος, column: see style[2].] A prolongation backward of the spinal column, especially of the last vertebra, in certain fishes and amphibians: in some Amphibia forming the greater part of the so-called sacrum, or a long bone in the axis of the spinal column behind the sacrum proper, and approximately coextensive with the length of the ilia.

urotoxic (ū-rō-tok′sik), a. [< Gr. οὖρον, urine, + τοξικόν, poison.] Of or pertaining to poisonous substances eliminated in the urine.

Urotrichus (ū-rot'ri-kus), n. [NL. (Temminck, 1838), < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + θρίξ (τριχ-), hair.] A genus of fossorial shrew-moles, of the subfamily Myogalinæ and family Talpidæ. They have 2 incisors, 1 canine, 4 premolars, and 3 molars in each upper half-jaw, and 1 incisor, 1 canine, 3 premolars, and 3 molars in each lower half-jaw. Urotrichus talpoides is a small Japanese species. This genus formerly contained the United States species U. gibbsi, now placed in Neürotrichus.

uroxanthin (ū-rok-san'thin), n. [< Gr. οὖρον, urine, + ξανθός, yellow, + *-in*2.] Urine indican: a derivative of indol, present in minute quantities in normal urine.

uroxin (ū-rok'sin), n. [< Gr. οὖρον, urine, + ὀξύς, sharp, + *-in*2.] Same as alloxantin.

Uroxiphus (ū-rok'si-fus), n. [NL., < Gr. οὐρά, tail, + ξίφος, sword.] A genus of hemipterous insects; the swordtails. The walnut swordtail, U. caryæ, is an example.

urrhodin (ū'rō-din), n. [< Gr. οὖρον, urine, + ῥόδινος, made of or from roses, < ῥόδον, the rose.] A red coloring matter occasionally found in alkaline urine in cases of inflammation of the bladder.

urry (ur'i), n. [Prob. < Gael. uireach, equiv. to uirlach, soil, dust, < uir, mold, earth: see *ure*6.] A sort of blue or black clay lying near a bed of coal. [Local.]

> In the coal-mines they dig a blue or black clay, that lies near the coal, commonly called urry, which is an unripe coal, and is very proper for hot lands, especially pasture-ground. Mortimer, Husbandry.

Ursa (ėr'sä), n. [NL., < L. ursa, a she-bear, fem. of ursus, bear: see Ursus.] A name of two constellations, Ursa Major and Ursa Minor, the Great and the Little Bear.—Ursa Major, the most prominent constellation of the northern heavens, representing a bear with an enormous tail. There is a rival figure for the same constellation—a wagon. (See wain.) Both figures are mentioned by Homer. The name of the bear is translated from some original Aryan language, since the constellation in Sanskrit is called riksha—a word which means in different genders a 'bear' and a 'star.' As the seven stars of the Great Bear are in many languages called the Septentrions, it is probable the figure of the bear, which by its tail would seem to have originated among some people not familiar with bears, may have been the result of a confusion of sound. Draco appears to have had formerly a longer tail, twisting down in front of Ursa Major.—Ursa Minor, a constellation near the north pole, the figure of which imitates that of Ursa Major, which its configuration resembles. It also has a rival figure of a wagon, and is sometimes called the Cynosure, which seems to mean 'dog's tail.' At the time of the formation of these constellations the pole must have been near α Draconis; and during the greater part of history sailors have steered by Ursa Minor as a whole. See cut above.

ursal (ėr'sal), n. [< L. ursus, bear, + -al.] An ursine seal, or sea-bear. [Rare.]

urset, a. An obsolete variant of worse.

> Uds blood, and hang him for urse than a rogue that will slash and cut for an oman, if she be a whore. Dekker and Webster, Northward Ho, ii. 1.

ursid (ėr'sid), n. A bear as a member of the Ursidæ.

Ursidæ (ėr'si-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Ursus + -idæ.] A family of plantigrade carnivorous mammals, the bears, outwardly characterized by large size, heavy, stout, and clumsy form, a pig-like snout, rudimentary tail, and shaggy hair. The family belongs to the order Feræ, suborder Fissipedia, and is the type of the arctoid series of the latter. (See Arctoidea.) The bears are less exclusively carnivorous than most other representatives of the order, being frugivorous as well, and almost omnivorous; the dentition is correspondingly modified, the grinders being more or less tubercular, not sectorial. There are two true molars on each side of the upper jaw, and three on each side of the lower jaw, all tubercular, as is the last upper premolar; there are also special cranial characters. The family was formerly of greater extent, including the racoon, badger, glutton, and other plantigrade Carnivora; it is now limited to the genus Ursus and its immediate relatives, or the bears proper, inhabiting chiefly the northern hemisphere. There are about 6 genera, of which Melursus or Prochilus is the most distinct from Ursus proper. See Ursus and *bear*2 (with cuts), and cuts under aswail, bruang, Plantigrada, scapholunar, and spectacled.

ursiform (ėr'si-fôrm), a. [< L. ursus, bear, + forma, form.] Having the form or aspect of a bear; related to the bears in structure; arctoid.

Ursinæ (ėr-sī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Ursus + -inæ.] 1. In mammal., the bears proper; the Ursidæ in a strict sense.—2. In entom., the bears: noting all hairy or woolly lepidopterous larvæ. See *bear*2, 6, and ursine, a., 2. Burmeister.

ursine (ėr'sin), a. and n. [= OF. ursin = It. orsino, < L. ursinus, of, pertaining to, or resembling a bear, < ursus = Gr. ἄρκτος, a bear (see arctic).] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to a bear or bears: as, an ursine genus; related to the bear; arctoid: as, the ursine series of Carnivora; resembling a bear or what relates to a bear: as, an ursine walk.—2. In entom., thickly clothed with long, bristle-like, erect hairs: applied especially to certain lepidopterous larvæ.—Ursine dasyure, howler, sloth. See the nouns.—Ursine otary, ursine seal, the northern sea-bear, an eared seal of the North Pacific, Callorhinus ursinus. See cut under fur-seal.

II. n. A bear; any member of the family Ursidæ.

urson (ėr'son), n. [< F. ourson, a bear's cub, < ours, bear, < L. ursus, a bear: see ursine.] The Canada porcupine, or tree-porcupine of eastern North America, sometimes called bear-porcupine, as by Harlan. The name was given or applied by Buffon. See Erethizon and cawquaw, and second cut under porcupine.

ursula (ėr'sū-lä), n. [< NL. ursula, specific name, < L. ursula*, dim. of ursa, a she-bear: see Ursuline.] A North American butterfly, Basilarchia or Limenitis astyanax (formerly L. ursula). It is purple-black with slight blue and red blotches, and hence is called red-spotted purple. Its larva feeds on many plants, as willow, oak, blackberry, cherry, and species of Vaccinium.

Ursula (Limenitis astyanax), about two thirds natural size.

Ursuline (ėr'sū-lin), a. and n. [< NL. Ursulinus, < LL. Ursula (see def.), a woman's name, < L. ursula*, dim. of ursa, a she-bear: see Ursa.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Roman Catholic order or company of Ursulines.

II. n. One of an order or company of Roman Catholic women founded by St. Angela Merici at Brescia in 1537, for the nursing of the sick and the teaching of young girls. The Ursulines took their name from St. Ursula, whose protection they invoked. At first they neither took regular vows nor adopted conventual rules, but in 1612 they were divided into the congregated Ursulines, who still adhere to the original organization, and the religious Ursulines, who take solemn vows, observe inclosure, and follow the rule of St. Augustine. The order was introduced into Canada in 1639, and into the present territory of the United States in 1727.

Ursus (ėr'sus), n. [NL., < L. ursus = Gr. ἄρκτος = Ir. art = Skt. riksha, a bear.] A genus of plantigrade carnivorous mammals, the bears, of the family Ursidæ. It was formerly coextensive with the family, and was even applied to some animals not now included in Ursidæ. It is now restricted to such species as the brown bear of Europe, U. arctos, and the grizzly and black bears of North America, U. horribilis and American Black Bear (Ursus americanus).

U. americanus; for the polar bear, spectacled bear, sunbear, and honey-bear (or sloth-bear) have been detached under the names of Thalassarctos, Tremarctos, Helarctos, and Melursus (or Prochilus) respectively. See *bear*2 (with cuts), and cuts under scapholunar and Plantigrada.

Urtica (ėr-ti'kä), n. [NL. (Malpighi, 1675; Brunfels, 1530), < L. urtica, a nettle, so called from the stinging hairs, < urere, burn: see ustion.] A genus of dicotyledonous plants, the nettles, type of the family Urticaceæ in the subtribe Ureræ. It is characterized by opposite leaves furnished with stinging hairs and free or united stipules; by the fruit, a straight achene; and by its unisexual flowers, the pistillate with four unequal segments. There are about 30 species, widely scattered over most temperate and subtemperate regions. They are annuals or perennials, in a few species woody at the base. They bear petioled toothed or lobed leaves, usually with from five to seven nerves. The small and inconspicuous greenish twin flowers are borne in small clusters or panicles. For the species in general, see *nettle*1; for U. ferox, see ongaonga. Nearly 400 former species are now classed elsewhere, especially under Urticastrum, Urera, Pilea, and Bœhmeria. England has 3 species, 2 of which, U. dioica and U. urens, occur occasionally in the United States; 6 others are natives of the United States, 5 in the west and southwest, and 1, U. gracilis, a tall wand-like nettle of fence-rows and springy places, ranging eastward and northward from Colorado to the Atlantic.

Urticaceæ (ėr-ti-kā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Reichenbach, 1828), < Urtica + -aceæ.] A family of apetalous plants, of the order Urticales, unlike all the other families of the order in the frequently herbaceous habit and in the presence of a distinct free perianth. It bears cymose staminate flowers, the perianth free from the accompanying bract, with one stamen opposite each lobe, or rarely fewer. The one-celled ovary contains a single ovule, the style at first terminal, but usually soon left at one side by the oblique growth of the indehiscent fruit, which is commonly a small achene or drupe, or by consolidation a syncarp. The family includes about 475 species, belonging to 42 genera, widely dispersed through warm and temperate regions, and classed in 5 tribes, of which the types are Urera, Elatostema, Bœhmeria, Parietaria, and Forskohlea. They are mostly herbaceous plants, numerous both in the tropics and in temperate regions, occasionally, as in Urera and Urticastrum, becoming trees. They are remarkable, in the typical subtribe, the Ureræ, for their stinging hairs, and more or less in all for the presence of abundant cystoliths or masses of crystals embedded in the tissues, and usually of a definite aspect, as radiating, fusiform, linear, etc., which is characteristic of each genus. Until recently the families Ulmaceæ (elm family) and Moraceæ (mulberry family) were included in the Urticaceæ, thus making it equivalent to the present order Urticales.

urticaceous (ėr-ti-kā'shius), a. In bot., of or pertaining to the Urticaceæ.

urtical (ėr'ti-kal), a. [< Urtica + -al.] 1. In bot., of or belonging to the nettles; typified by the genus Urtica: as, the urtical alliance. Lindley.—2. Stinging; capable of urticating; serving for urtication, as the trichocysts of infusorians. See trichocyst.

Urticales (ėr-ti-kā'lēz), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1833), < Urtica + -ales.] An order of dicotyledonous archichlamydeous (apetalous) plants embracing the families Urticaceæ, Moraceæ, and Ulmaceæ. Originally (Lindley's urtical alliance) it also included the Platenaceæ, Ceratophyllaceæ, and part of the Euphorbiaceæ. As now restricted the Urticaceæ only contain herbaceous plants. The rest are chiefly trees, some of them of great economic importance, as the elms, mulberries, fig-trees, breadfruit trees, etc. Generally speaking, their leaves are alternate, in outline entire, toothed, lobed, or palmately parted, and with deciduous stipules which often inclose the terminal bud. The inflorescence is primarily centripetal, but ultimately centrifugal, often in few-flowered clusters, sometimes forming a dense spike, raceme, or panicle, or with all the flowers closely massed on a fleshy receptacle. The order yields a number of edible fruits—as the fig, breadfruit, jackfruit, mulberry, and hackberry—in which the edible part may be either the ripened ovary, as the hackberry, or a fleshy calyx, as the mulberry, or the fleshy receptacle, as the fig, forming a syconium, or the thickened seed, as in species of Artocarpus. The order also included several important dyewoods, as fustic; several ornamental as well as timber trees planted for shade or for hedges, as the elm, mulberry, and Osage orange; and many valuable fibers, as hemp and ramie. Species of some genera produce a narcotic resin, as hops and also hemp. (See hashish.) Several of the most notable trees belong here, as the banian, the bo-tree or sacred fig, the sycamore-fig, and the famed upas-tree of Java. (See Ficus and Antiaris.) In the Moreæ and Artocarpeæ, and especially in the genus Ficus, an acrid emetic or poisonous milky juice abounds, either white or yellowish, in many furnishing india-rubber, in others becoming resinous, and yielding a gum. In a few, ★the cow-trees, it is innocuous, and is used as a beverage.

urticaria (ėr-ti-kā′ri-ą), n. [= F. urticaire, < NL. urticaria, nettle-rash, < L. urtica, a nettle: see Urtica.] Nettle-rash; uredo; hives. The disease is an eruption of wheals, occurring as an idiosyncrasy in some persons after eating shell-fish, certain fruits, or other food, and almost always dependent upon some gastric derangement. The wheals are indurated elevations of the skin, of varying size, whitish on the top (the swelling having forced the blood out of the capillaries of the skin), and surrounded by a reddened zone. They give rise to intense itching, especially when on the covered parts of the body. They appear suddenly and pass away with equal rapidity, one or more crops often coming and going in the course of a single day.

urticarial (ėr-ti-kā′ri-ąl), a. [< urticaria + -al.] Pertaining to, of the nature of, or affected with urticaria. Medical News, LII. 546.

urticarious (ėr-ti-kā′ri-us), a. [< urticaria + -ous.] Same as urticarial. Medical News, ★LII. 720.

urticate (ėr′ti-kāt), v.; pret. and pp. urticated, ppr. urticating. [< ML. urticatus, pp. of urticare (> OF. ortier; cf. It. orticheggiare), sting like a nettle, < L. urtica, a nettle: see Urtica.] I. trans. To sting like a nettle; nettle with stinging hairs; produce urtication in or of.

II. intrans. To have or exercise the faculty of urticating; effect urtication; sting.—Urticating batteries, capsule, filament. See battery, etc.—Urticating larva, a larva covered with spiny hairs, which have a stinging or nettling effect upon the skin of one handling it. See stinging caterpillar (with cut), under stinging.

urtication (ėr-ti-kā′shon), n. [= F. urtication; as urticate + -ion.] The action or result of urticating or stinging; a stinging or nettling operation or effect; specifically, the whipping of a benumbed or paralytic limb with nettles, in order to restore its feeling.

Urticeæ (ėr-tis′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1805), < Urtica + -eæ.] The name employed for the plant family Urticaceæ by those botanists who treated it as a tribe and made the family equivalent to the order Urticales. See Urticaceæ and Urticales.

urubitinga (ö″rö-bi-ting′gą), n. [Tupi urubú, a vulture, + -tinga, white, bright, beautiful.] The native name of some hawk or other bird of prey of South America. It is adopted in ornithology (a) as the specific name of an alleged species of Cathartes, related to the turkey-buzzard of North America, and (b) [cap.] as the generic name of a number of black-and-white hawks of the buteonine division of the family Falconidæ. U. zonura of Brazil, etc., is the leading species; the anthracite hawk, U. anthracina, ranges from Central America northward into the United States. The genus was named as such by Lesson in 1836.

urubu (ö″rö-bö′), n. [Tupi.] One of the American vultures; a bird of the genus Cathartes or Catharista. The name is commonly applied, in ornithology, to the black vulture, or zopilote, the iribu of Azara, Catharista urubu of Vieillot, Vultur iota or Cathartes iota of some writers, now usually known as Catharista atrata. This resembles the common turkey-buzzard of the United States, but differs in the mode of feathering of the neck, proportions of wings and tail, shape of bill, etc. It inhabits the warmer parts of America, from latitude 40° S. to nearly 40° N., and is common in the southern United States as far north as the Carolinas. It is very voracious, and acts as an efficient scavenger in the towns, where it becomes semi-domesticated. See also cut under Cathartes.

Urubu (Catharista atrata).

urucuri (ö-rö-kö′ri), n. [Tupi urucuri.] A Brazilian palm, Attalea excelsa. Its large oily nuts are burned for their smoke in curing Para india-rubber. Urucuri-iba is the name of Cocos coronata.

Uruguayan (ö′rö-gwā-ąn), a. and n. [< Uruguay (see def.) + -an.] I. a. Pertaining to Uruguay, a republic of South America, situated south of Brazil.

II. n. An inhabitant of Uruguay.

urus (ū′rus), n. [NL., < L. urus = Gr. οὖρος, wild ox, from the Teut. name represented by OHG. ūr = AS. ūr = Icel. ūrr, also in comp. OHG. urohso, etc.: see ure[3] and aurochs.] 1. A kind of wild bull described by Cæsar; the mountain-bull, which ran wild in Gaul at the period of the Roman invasion, but has long been extinct. This is the Bos urus, or B. primigenius, of naturalists, and is also called reem, tur, ur, ure, and ure-ox. The urus had long spreading horns, unlike the European bison (Bison bonasus) or aurochs, and more like ordinary cattle, of which B. primigenius is a presumed ancestral form; but by some misunderstanding the name urus has also attached to the aurochs, a few individuals of which still linger wild, but under protection, in the forests of Lithuania. It has been thought, erroneously, that the "Chillingham cattle," such as exist in confinement at Chillingham in Northumberland, England, and Hamilton in Lanarkshire, Scotland, are descendants of the animal described by Cæsar. See cut under aurochs.

2. [cap.] A genus of Bovidæ, including the aurochs and extinct bisons: therefore equivalent to Bison as now employed. Bojanus, 1827; Owen, 1843.—3. A kind of fossil ox from Eschscholtz Bay, Alaska. Buckland, 1831.

urva (ėr′vą), n. [NL. urva, from an E. Ind. name.] 1. The crab-eating ichneumon of India, Herpestes urva, of a black color, the hairs annulated with white, and with a white stripe on the side of the head.—2. [cap.] A generic name of such ichneumons, of which there are 3 Asiatic species, as U. cancrivora. B. R. Hodgson.

urvant (ėr′vant), a. [Appar. an error for curvant.] In her., same as urved.

urved (ėrvd), a. [Appar. an error for curved.] In her., turned or bowed upward. Berry.

us[1] (us), pron. The objective case of we.

us[2]†, n. An old spelling of use[1].

U. S. An abbreviation of United States (of ★America).

U. S. A. An abbreviation (a) of United States of America, and (b) of United States Army.

usable (ū′zą-bl), a. [Also useable; < use + -able.] Capable of being used.

> A lame carriage-horse threw everything into sad uncertainty. It might be weeks, it might be only a few days, before the horse was useable. Jane Austen, Emma, xlii.

usableness (ū′zą-bl-nes), n. The character of ★being usable. Also spelled useableness.

usage (ū′zāj), n. [< ME. usage, < OF. (and F.) usage = Pr. usatge = Sp. usaje = It. usaggio, < ML. usaticum, usage, < L. usus, use: see use.] 1†. Use; enjoyment.

> Kept her to his usage and his store.
> Chaucer, Good Women, l. 2337.

2. The act of using.

> Nor be thou rageful, like a handled bee,
> And lose thy life by usage of thy sting.
> Tennyson, The Ancient Sage.

3. Mode of using or treating; treatment.

> Deliver what you are, and how you came > To this sad cave, and what your usage was?
> Beau. and Fl., Knight of Burning Pestle, iii. 4.

> As I promis'd

> And all despised and fed the pliant boy.
> Crabbe, The Parish Register (Works, I. 64).

4. Long-continued use or practice; customary way of acting; habitual use; custom; practice: as, the ancient usage of Parliament. Technically, in English law, usage has a different signification from custom, in not implying immemorial existence or general prevalence. In earlier times custom was defined as a law created or evidenced by immemorial usage. Some American writers use the terms as practically equivalent, except in regarding usage as the facts by which the existence of custom is proved; others treat usage as the habit of individuals or classes, such as those engaged in a particular trade or business, and custom as the habit of communities or localities.

> Afterward, as is the right usage,
> The lordys all to hir dede homage.
> Generydes (E. E. T. S.), l. 251.

> Usage confirm'd what Fancy had begun.
> Prior, Henry and Emma.

Usages, no matter of what kind, which circumstances have established . . . become sanctified.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 522.

The custom of making their own Ordinances—like the Usages of a Corporation, the "Customary" of a Manor, . . . or the "Bye-laws" of a Parish—is but another illustration of the old common law of England.
English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), Int., p. xxxviii.

5. Established or customary mode of employing a particular word, phrase, or construction; current locution.

> The more closely one looks into usage, the firmer must be one's conviction that its adjudications have greatly more of freedom and elasticity than find countenance with mere word-fanciers. F. Hall, Modern English, Pref.

6†. Manners; behavior; conduct. Spenser, F. Q., IV. vii. 45.

> He is able with his tongue and usage to deceive and abuse the wisest man that is.
> Harman, Caveat for Cursetors, p. 51.

By usage, customarily; regularly.

> They helde hem payed of fruites that they ete,
> Which that the feldes gave hem by usage.
> Chaucer, Former Age, l. 4.

Law and usage of Parliament. See parliamentary law, under parliamentary.—The usages, certain forms and rites in the celebration of the eucharist maintained by some of the nonjuring clergy in England and Scotland—namely, the mixed chalice, the invocation and oblation in the prayer of consecration, and distinct and separate prayer for the departed. Those who supported the usages were called usagers, and their opponents non-usagers. All the usages were enjoined in the nonjurors' communion office of 1718. The liturgical forms were authorized in the Scottish communion office of 1764, and the mixed chalice became an established custom. See nonjuror.—Usages of war. See war[1].=Syn. 4. Habit, Manner, etc. See custom.

usager (ū′zā-jėr), n. [< F. usager, < usage, usage: see usage.] 1. One who has the use of anything in trust for another. Daniel.—2. One of a party which maintained the usages (see phrase under usage) among the English nonjurors and in the Scottish Episcopal Church.

usance (ū′ząns), n. [< ME. usaunce, < OF. usance, < usant, using: see usant.] 1†. Using; use; employment.

> By this discriminative usance or sanctification of things sacred the name of God is honoured and sanctified.
> Joseph Mede, Diatribe, p. 60.

> But why do you call this benefit made of our money usury and madness? It is but usance, and husbanding of our stock. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 281.

2†. Usage; custom.

> As was her usaunce
> To forthren every wight, and doon plesaunce
> Of veray bounte and of courtesye.
> Chaucer, Good Women, l. 1476.

3†. Premium paid for the use of money loaned; interest.

> He lends out money gratis and brings down
> The rate of usance. Shak., M. of V., i. 3. 46.

4. The time which is allowed by custom or usage for the payment of bills of exchange drawn on a distant country. The length of the usance varies in different places from fourteen days to six months after the date of the bill, and the bill may be drawn at usance, half usance, double usance, etc. In recent years a four months' usance has been established for India, China, Japan, etc.

usant† (ū′zant), a. [< ME. usaunt, < OF. usant, ppr. of user, use: see use.] Using; accustomed.

> A theef he was of corn and eek of mele,
> And that a sly and usaunt [var. usyng] for to stele.

7†. That part of a sermon devoted to a practical application of the doctrine expounded.

The parson has an edifying stomach, . . .
He hath begun three draughts of sack in doctrines,
And four in uses. B. Jonson, Magnetick Lady, iii. 1.

8. In liturgics, the distinctive ritual and liturgical forms and observances, collectively and singly, of a particular church, diocese, group of dioceses, or community: as, Sarum use; Aberdeen use; Anglican use; Roman use. The term is most frequently applied to the varieties of ritual and liturgical usage in England before the Reformation and to monastic and Roman usage as differing from these, and also to the different local varieties of the ancient Gallican offices. In England the several uses were those of Sarum, York, Hereford, Bangor, Lincoln, etc. These had a common family likeness, and differed considerably from Roman use. The most important of them was Sarum or Salisbury use, which was the form of service compiled about 1085 from various diocesan uses, English and Norman, by St. Osmund, bishop of Salisbury and chancellor of England. The use of Sarum prevailed throughout the greater part of England, and in 1542 it was ordered to be observed throughout the whole province of Canterbury. The Book of Common Prayer, first issued in 1549, and founded mainly on Salisbury use, established a uniform liturgy for the whole Church of England, but, except by implication of certain rubrics, left the exact mode of ritual observance in many respects unprovided for. See liturgy, 3 (4). — Sarum use. See def. 8. — To have no use for. (a) To have no occasion or need for; be unable to convert to a profitable end; not to want. (b) To have no liking for. [U. S.]

When Pompey liv'd,
He us'd you nobly; now he is dead, use him so.
Fletcher (and another), False One, ii. 1.

'Sdeath! what a brute am I to use her thus!
Sheridan, The Rivals, iii. 2.

3. To accustom; habituate; render familiar by practice; inure: common in the past participle: as, soldiers used to hardships.

About eighteene yeers agone, hauing pupils at Cambridge studious of the Latine tongue, I vsed them often to write Epistles and Theames together, and dailie to translate some peece of English into Latine.
Baret, Alvearie (1580), To the Reader.

It will next behoove us to consider the inconvenience we fall into by using our selves to bee guided by these kind of Testimonies. Milton, Prelatical Episcopacy.

If it be one of the baser consolations, it is also one of the most disheartening concomitants of long life, that we get used to everything. Lowell, Wordsworth.

4. To frequent; visit often or habitually.

Within my doors to me.
Beau. and Fl., Coxcomb, iv. 2.

As thou usest to do unto those that love thy name.
Ps. cxix. 132.

So when they came to the door they went in, not knocking; for folks use not to knock at the door of an inn.
Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, ii.

2. To be wont; be customary; customarily be, do, or effect something specified.

Of Court, it seemes, men Courtesie doe call,
For that it there most useth to abound.
Spenser, F. Q., VI. i. 1.

Madam, your beauty uses to command,
And not to beg! what is your suit to me?
Beau. and Fl., King and No King, iii. 1.

How alter'd is each pleasant nook;—
And used the dumpy church to look
So dumpy in the spire?
Locker, Bramble-rise.

3. To be accustomed to go; linger or stay habitually; dwell. [Obsolete or provincial.]

This fellow useth to the fencing-school, this to the dancing school. Dekker, Gull's Hornbook, p. 154.

I will give thee for thy food
No fish that useth in the mud.
Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess, iii. 1.

Ders er ole gray rat wat uses 'bout yer, en time atter time he comes out w'en you all done gond ter bed, . . . en me en him talks by de 'our.
J. C. Harris, Uncle Remus, xiv.

4†. To communicate; receive the eucharist.

And the to torches, eueri day in the ger, scullen ben light and brennynge at the heye messe at selue auter, from the leuacioun of cristis body sacrid, in til that the priest haue vsed. English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 27.

When the preste hath don his masse,
Vsed, & his hondes wasche,
A-nothur oryson he moste say.
Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 91.

use[2] (ūs), n. [< ME. ues*, oes*, oyss, < OF. ues, oes, uoes, eus, os, oeps, obs = Pr. obs = OSp. huevos = It. uopo, profit, advantage, use, need, < L. opus, work, labor, need, AL. use, in legal sense: see opus. The word use[2] has been confused with use[1], with which it is now practically identical.] In law, the benefit or profit (with power to direct disposal) of property — technically of lands and tenements — in the possession of another who simply holds them for the beneficiary; the equitable ownership of lands the legal title to which is in another. He to whose use or benefit the trust is intended enjoys the use of profits, and is called cestui que use. Since the Statute of Uses, the gift or grant of real property to the use of a person transfers to him directly the legal title; and the term trust is now commonly used to denote the kind of estate formerly signified by use, so far as the law now permits it to exist. (See trust[1], 5.) Uses apply only to lands of inheritance; no use can subsist of leaseholds.

And use is a trust or confidence reposed in some other.
Sir E. Coke, Com. on Littleton, 272 b.

Use seems to be an older word than trust. Its first occurrence in statute law is in 7 Ric. II. c. 12, in the form æps. In Littleton "confidence" is the word employed. The Statute of Uses seems to regard use, trust, and confidence as synonymous. According to Bacon, it was its permanency that distinguished the use from the trust.
Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 596.

Charitable uses, Charitable Uses Act. See charitable. — Covenant to stand seized to uses. See covenant. — Domain of use. See domain. — Executed use. See executed. — Executory uses, springing uses. — Feoffee to uses. See feoffee. — Ferial use, Festal use. See ferial. — Future or contingent use, a use limited to a person not ascertained, or depending on an uncertain event, but without derogation of a use previously limited. — In use. (a) In employment. (b) In customary practice or observance.

When abjurations were in use in this land, the state and law were satisfied if the abjuror came to the sea-side, and waded into the sea when winds and tides resisted.
Donne, Letters, vii.

Pious uses, religious uses; more specifically, that class of religious uses which was not condemned by the law as superstitious. — Public use. See public. — Religious uses, uses or trusts for the propagation of religion, the support of religious institutions, or the performance of religious rites. — Resulting use. See result, v. i. — Secondary use. Same as shifting use. — Shifting use, a use or trust properly created for the benefit of one person, but so as to pass from him upon a specified contingency and vest wholly or in part in another. Thus, if A enfeoffed B to the use of C and his heirs, but if C should die or should inherit another estate in the lifetime of A, then to D and his heirs, the occurrence of the contingency would cause the use (and therefore, under the Statute of Uses, the legal title) to shift from C to D. — Springing use, the creation of an estate so as to arise (spring into effect) on a future event, after an estate enjoyed by the grantor, by means of a feoffment or conveyance under the Statute of Uses. — Statute of charitable uses. See statute. — Statute of Uses, an English statute of 1536 (27 Hen. VIII., c. 10) against uses and against devising lands by will (a practice which tended to defeat feudal dues), and intended to give the legal estate or absolute ownership to those who are entitled to the beneficial enjoyment of land. The principal clause enacted that thereafter whoever should have a use, confidence, or trust in any hereditaments should be deemed and adjudged in lawful seizin, estate, and possession of the same estate that he had in use—that is, that he, instead of the nominal grantee or trustee, should become the full legal owner. This principle has been adopted by provisions, known by the same title, in the legislation of most of the United States.—Superstitious uses, such religious uses as were condemned by English law at or after the Reformation as maintaining superstition, in which were included the providing of masses for the dead, etc. In the United States, generally, no restriction is placed upon uses for these purposes as such, all religious tenets not involving any contravention of the criminal law being on an equal footing; but trusts for such purposes are required to conform to the same rules as trusts for charitable or other secular uses, in respect to the existence of a competent corporate trustee and a defined or ascertainable object.—Use and occupation, the enjoyment of possession or the holding of real property belonging to another without a written lease, but under circumstances implying a liability to make compensation in the nature of rent.—Use plaintiff, a person beneficially interested in a claim, and for whose use or benefit an action is brought thereon in the name of another, as in the name of an apparent owner, or in the name of the state.

useable, useableness. See usable, usableness.

usee (ū-zē′), n. [< use[2] + -ee.] A person for whose use a suit is brought in the name of another. [Rare.]

useful (ūs′fụl), a. [< use[1] + -ful.] Being of use, advantage, or profit; valuable for use; suited or adapted to a purpose; producing or having power to produce good; beneficial; profitable; serviceable.

The Scot, because he hath always been an useful Confederate to France against England, hath (among other Privileges) Right of Pre-emption or first choice of Wines in Bourdeaux. Howell, Letters, ii. 54.

Now blind, dishearten'd, sham'd, dishonour'd, quell'd,
To what can I be useful? Milton, S. A., l. 564.

The useful arts are reproductions or new combinations, by the wit of man, of the same natural benefactors.
Emerson, Nature.

Useful invention. See invention. = Syn. Advantageous, serviceable, helpful, available, salutary.

usefully (ūs′fụl-i), adv. In a useful manner; profitably; beneficially; in such a manner as to effect or advance some end.

usefulness (ūs′fụl-nes), n. The state or character of being useful; conduciveness to some end; utility; serviceableness; advantage.

useless (ūs′les), a. [< use + -less.] Having no use; being of no use; unserviceable; usable to no good end; answering no valuable purpose; not advancing the end proposed; unprofitable; ineffectual.

Where none admire, 'tis useless to excel.
Lord Lyttelton.

An idler is a watch that wants both hands,
As useless if it goes as when it stands.
Cowper, Retirement, l. 682.

=Syn. Useless, Fruitless, Ineffectual, Unavailing, bootless, profitless, unprofitable, valueless, worthless, futile, abortive. Useless often implies that the cause of failure lies in the situation: as, it is useless to try to mend that clock. Useless is the only one of these words that may thus be applied by anticipation to what might be attempted. That which is fruitless, ineffectual, or unavailing actually fails, and from hindrances external to itself. Unavailing is more likely to be used than fruitless or ineffectual where the failure is through some one's unwillingness: as, unavailing prayers or petitions, ineffectual efforts, fruitless labors. Fruitless is stronger and more final than ineffectual or unavailing.

uselessly (ūs′les-li), adv. In a useless manner; without profit or advantage.

uselessness (ūs′les-nes), n. The state or character of being useless; unserviceableness; unfitness for any valuable purpose or for the purpose intended.

user[1] (ū′zėr), n. [< ME. user; < use[1] + -er[1].] One who or that which uses.

Yf ther be eny wyndowes, dorres, or holes of newe made in to the yeld walle, wherthorough eny persone may se, here, or have knowlech what ys done in the seid halle, that it be so stopped by the doers or vsers therof, uppon peyne of xiii. s. iiij. d. English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 387.

Beauty's waste hath in the world an end,
And, kept unused, the user so destroys it.
Shak., Sonnets, ix.

user[2] (ū′zėr), n. [< OF. user, inf. as noun: see use, v.] In law, the using or exercise, as of a right; continued use or enjoyment; the acting in a manner which implies a claim of right so to do. See non-user.—Adverse user, such a use of property as the owner himself would exercise, disregarding the claims of others entirely, asking permission from no one, and using the property under a claim of right. Mitchell, J., 120 Jud. Rep., p. 598.—Right of user. (a) The right to use, as distinguished from ownership. (b) The presumptive right arising from continued user.

ush (ush), v. t. [A back-formation, < usher.] To usher. [Obsolete or colloq.]

If he winna fee to me
Three valets or four,
To beir my tail up frae the dirt
And ush me throw the town.
The Vain Gudewife, st. 3.

Ustilaginaceæ (us″ti-laj-i-nā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Ustilago (-gin-) + -aceæ.] An extensive family of fungi, the smuts, parasitic in the tissues of living plants, especially flowering plants, causing much damage, particularly to the grasses. The mycelium is widely spreading, but soon vanishes. The spores are produced in the interior of mycelial branches, which often become gelatinized. The life-history begins with the production from the resting-spore of a promycelium which bears promycelial spores. These spores frequently conjugate in pairs, and directly, or by means of sporids, produce a new mycelium, which in turn bears the resting-spores in another plant. Ustilago, Urocystis, and Tilletia are the most important genera. See Coniomycetes, smut, 3, Fungi. Also Ustilagineæ.

ustilagineous (us″ti-lā-jin′ē-us), a. In bot., of or pertaining to the Ustilaginaceæ.

usucapient (ū-zū-kā'pi-ẹnt), n. One who has acquired, or claims to have acquired, by usucaption.

The burden of debts must in like manner have fallen on the usucapient or usucapients in proportion to the shares they had taken of the deceased's property.
Encyc. Brit., XX. 692.

usucapt (ū'zū-kapt), v. To acquire by prescription or usucaption.

Under the jus civile, on failure of agnates (and of the gens where there was one), the succession was vacant and fell to the fisc, unless perchance it was usucapted by a stranger possessing pro herede. Encyc. Brit., XX. 702.

usucaptible (ū-zū-kap'ti-bl), a. [< L. usucaptus, pp. of usucapere, acquire by prescription: see usucaption.] Capable of being acquired by possession, prescription, or usucaption.

Any citizen occupying immovables or holding movables as his own, provided they were usucaptible and he had not taken them theftuously, acquired a quiritary right in two years or one as the case might be, simply on the strength of his possession. Encyc. Brit., XX. 690.

usucaption (ū-zū-kap'shọn), n. [Cf. F. usucapion, < L. usucapio(n-), an acquisition by possession or prescription, < usucapere, pp. usucaptus, prop. two words, usu capere, acquire by prescription: usu, abl. of usus, use; capere, pp. captus, take: see use and caption.] In civil law, the acquisition of the title or right to property by the uninterrupted and undisputed possession of it for a certain term prescribed by law. It is nearly equivalent or correlative to the common-law prescription, but differs in that possession in good faith was required to constitute usucaption, but need not be in good faith to constitute prescription.

As the title here depends on possession, which is a mere fact, it is plainly reasonable that the law where the fact occurs should be applied in questions of usucaption or prescription, which is right growing out of a continued fact.
Woolsey, Introd. to Inter. Law, ¶ 71.

usudurian (ū'zū-dū'ri-ạn), n. [Prob. irreg. < L. usus, use, + durus, hard, + -ian.] A packing-material prepared from unvulcanized rubber combined with other materials. It is a non-conductor, and when exposed to the action of steam it becomes vulcanized, and is very durable. By the application of naphtha to two pieces of this packing, they are made to unite homogeneously under pressure, and a mass of any size or thickness is thus readily built up. ★E. H. Knight.

usufruct (ū'zū-frukt), n. [= F. usufruit = Pr. usufrug = Sp. species, as U. elegans, U. stansburiana, U. ornata, etc., inhabiting western regions of the United States, as from Utah southward.

Utamania (ū-tạ-mā'ni-ạ), n. [NL. (Leach, 1816), also Utumania.] A genus of Alcidæ, whose type is the razor-billed auk, Alca or Utamania torda, chiefly differing from Alca proper in having the wings sufficiently developed for flight. See cut under razorbill.

utast, utis† (ū'tas, ū'tis), n. [Also utass, utast; < ME. utas, < OF. utes, utas, utus, utaves, oitieves, oitauves, octaves, F. octaves, the octave of a festival, pl. of octave, octave, = Sp. Pg. octava = It. ottava, an octave; < L. octavas (dies): see octave.] 1. The octave of a festival, a legal term, or other particular occasion — that is, the space of eight days after it, or the last day of that space of time: as, the utas of Saint Hilary.

Quod Gawein, . . . "let vs sette the day of spousaile;" and than toke thei day to-geder the vtas after, and com thus spekynge in to the halle. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 449.

Utas of a feest, octaves. Palsgrave.

Hence — 2. Bustle; stir; unrestrained jollity or festivity, as during the octave of a festival.

By the mass, here will be old Utis; it will be an excellent stratagem. Shak., 2 Hen. IV., ii. 4. 22.

Ute (ūt), n. [Native name.] A member of a tribe of American Indians who belong to the Shoshone family, and dwell in Utah, Colorado, and neighboring regions.

utensil (ū-ten'sil, formerly also ū'ten-sil), n. [Early mod. E. utensile; ME. utensyl; < OF. utensile, F. ustensile (with s erroneously inserted in imitation of OF. ustil, ostil, F. outil, implement (see hustlement), or us, use) = Sp. utensilio = Pg. utensilio = It. utensile, < L. utensile, usually in pl. utensilia, a thing fit for use, a utensil, neut. of utensilis, fit for use, useful, < uti, use: see use[1]. Cf. utile.] An instrument or implement: as, utensils of war; now, more especially, an instrument or vessel in common use in a kitchen, dairy, or the like, as distinguished from agricultural implements and mechanical tools.

The Crucifixes and other Utensils were dispos'd in order for beginning the procession. Maundrell, Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 72.

I earnestly intreat you to get the utensils for observing the Quantities of Rain which fall at York, which will be an experiment exceedingly acceptable to every curious person. W. Derham, in Ellis's Lit. Letters, p. 316.

=Syn. Implement, Instrument, etc. See tool.

uteri, n. Plural of uterus.

uterine (ū'tẹ-rin), a. [= F. utérin = Sp. Pg. ★It. uterino, < LL. uterinus, born of the same mother, lit. of the (same) womb, < L. uterus, womb: see uterus.] 1. Of or pertaining to the uterus or womb: as, uterine complaints. — 2. Born of the same mother, but by a different father.

He [Francis Bacon] had a uterine brother, Anthony Bacon, who was a very great statesman, and much beyond his brother Francis for the Politiques. Aubrey, Lives (Francis Bacon).

Uterine artery, a branch of the anterior division of the internal iliac artery, very tortuous in its course along the side of the uterus between the layers of the broad ligament, giving off numerous branches, which ramify on the anterior and posterior surfaces and in the substance of the uterus. — Uterine cake. See placenta, 1 (a). — Uterine gestation, plexus, sinus. See the nouns. — Uterine sac, in ascidians, the shortened and widened oviduct, containing the ovarian follicle and ovum. Its oviducal part is applied to the wall of the ovicyst, or incubatory pouch, while the other or inner half contains the ovum. — Uterine souffle. Same as placental souffle (which see, under placental). — Uterine tubes, tympanites, vellum. See the nouns.

uterocopulatory (ū″tẹ-rǫ-kop'ū-lā-tǫ-ri), a. Vaginal or copulatory, as certain sexual passages of hermaphrodite gastropods: correlated with uterodeferent.

uterodeferent (ū″tẹ-rǫ-def'ėr-ẹnt), a. Oviducal or deferent, as certain sexual passages of hermaphrodite gastropods: correlated with uterocopulatory.

uterogestation (ū″tẹ-rǫ-jes-tā'shọn), n. [< L. uterus, uterus, + gestatio(n-), gestation.] Gestation in the womb from conception to birth.

uteromania (ū″tẹ-rǫ-mā'ni-ạ), n. Nymphomania. ★ uterus (ū'tẹ-rus), n.; pl. uteri (-rī). [= F. utérus = Sp. útero = Pg. It. utero, < L. uterus, also uter and uterum, the womb, belly; cf. Gr. ὑστέρα, the womb: see hysteria.] 1. The womb; that part of the female sexual passage to which a ripe ovum is conveyed from the ovary, and in which it is detained in gestation until the fetus is matured and expelled in parturition. It is a section of an oviduct, originally a Müllerian duct, enlarged, thickened, united with its fellow of the opposite side, or otherwise modified, to serve as a resting-place for the ovum while this is developed to or toward maturity as an embryo or a fetus, whence it is then discharged through a cloaca or a vagina. The uterus is single in most Monodelphia, and double in Didelphia and Ornithodelphia. When united, u, uterus; c, its neck or cervix; l, Fallopian tube; du, decidua uterina; ds, decidua serotina; dr, decidua reflexa, that part of the decidua uterina which is reflected over the ovum and consequently envelops the chorion; ch, chorion, or outermost fetal envelop proper (originally the cell-wall of the ovum), lined by am, the amnion, or innermost fetal envelop, in the cavity of which the fetus floats in the liquor amnii; nb, the already shrunken umbilical vesicle lying between the amnion and the chorion; al, allantois, forming the navel-string, or umbilical cord, and the fetal part of the placenta; z, z, chorionic villi, most of which enter into the formation of the placenta; os, os tincæ, or mouth of the womb.

but incompletely, it constitutes a uterus bicornis, or two-horned womb. In birds the name uterus is given to that terminal part of the oviduct where the egg is detained to receive its shell. The non-pregnant human uterus is a pear-shaped organ about 3 inches long, with a broad, flattened part above (the body), and a narrow, more cylindrical part below (the cervix). Within is a cavity which passes out into the Fallopian tube on each side above, and below opens into the vagina. The cavity narrows as it passes into the cervix at the internal os, and continues downward as the cervical canal, to terminate at the external os uteri or os tincæ. The uterus is supported by the broad ligament, a transverse fold of peritoneum which embraces it on each side, and by accessory ligaments, such as the round, vesico-uterine, and recto-uterine ligaments. It consists of a serous or peritoneal coat, a middle coat of smooth muscular fibers, forming most of its thickness, and an epithelial lining. See also cut under peritoneum.

2. In invertebrates, as worms, a special section of the oviduct, or sundry appendages of the oviduct, which subserve a uterine function. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 182. See cuts under germarium, Rhabdocœla, Cestoidea, and Nematoidea. — 3. In Fungi. See peridium. — Anteflection of the uterus. See anteflection. — Anteversion of the uterus. See anteversion. — Arbor-vitæ of the uterus, pinnate folds of the mucous membrane of the cervix uteri. — Bifid uterus, a uterus having two bodies instead of one: same as uterus bicornis. — Bilocular uterus. See uterus bilocularis. — Body of the uterus. Same as corpus uteri (which see, under corpus). — Cervix uteri. See cervix. — Corpus uteri. See corpus. — Defectus uteri, complete congenital absence of the uterus. — Double-mouthed uterus. Same as uterus biforis. — Double uterus, uterus duplex. Same as uterus didelphys. — Fundus of the uterus, fundus uteri. See fundus. — Gravid uterus, the womb during pregnancy, containing the product of conception. — Heart-shaped uterus, uterus cordiformis, an imperfect uterus bicornis, the fundus being slightly depressed in the middle, so as to give the organ a heart-shaped appearance. — Hernia of the uterus, a very rare condition in which the womb is forced through the middle line of the abdominal wall or through the inguinal or femoral ring; hysterocele. — Hour-glass contraction of the uterus, a circular contraction of the internal os, occurring in rare instances immediately after childbirth, thus dividing the womb into two cavities, in the upper of which the placenta may be retained. — Inertia of the uterus, weak and ineffective contractions of the uterus during childbirth. — Infantile uterus, an undeveloped uterus. — In utero, in the womb. — Inversion of the uterus, an accident that sometimes, though rarely, occurs after delivery, in which the flabby uterus turns inside out. — Involution of the uterus, the process of restoration of the uterus to its original size after childbirth. This occurs through fatty degeneration of the hypertrophied uterine muscle. — Isthmus of the uterus, a slight circular depression on the external surface of the womb, corresponding to the location of the internal os. — Neck of the uterus. Same as cervix uteri (which see, under cervix). — One-horned uterus. Same as uterus unicornis. — Os uteri, the mouth of the womb. — Os uteri externum, the external os or mouth of the womb, forming the opening into the vagina. — Os uteri internum, the internal os, at the junction of the cervix with the corpus of the womb. — Pregnant uterus. Same as gravid uterus. — Procidentia of the uterus, an exaggerated condition of prolapse, in which the organ passes through the vulvar orifice. — Prolapse of the uterus, a descent of the womb from its proper position, owing to relaxation of the parts normally sustaining it. — Puerperal uterus, the uterus after childbirth and before the completion of involution. — Retractores uteri. See retractor. — Retroflection of the uterus. See retroflection. — Retroversion of the uterus. See retroversion. — Rupture of the uterus. (a) A tear in the wall of the womb, taking place during labor when there is an impediment to the descent of the child: a rare and usually fatal accident. (b) Same as hernia of the uterus. — Septate uterus. Same as uterus bilocularis. — Subinvolution of the uterus, delayed or incomplete involution of the uterus. — Two-chambered uterus. Same as uterus bilocularis. — Two-horned uterus. Same as uterus bicornis. — Uterus bicornis, a two-horned womb, resulting from incomplete union of right and left oviducts. It is normal in various animals, abnormal in woman. — Uterus biforis, a septate uterus in which the septum exists only at the external os, the cavity above being single. — Uterus bilocularis, a uterus the cavity of which is divided into two by a septum. It is distinguished from uterus bicornis by there being no traces of a division on the surface of the organ. — Uterus cordiformis. See heart-shaped uterus. — Uterus didelphys, or uterus diadelphys, a condition in which two separate organs, distinct in all their parts, exist. Also double uterus. — Uterus masculinus. Same as prostatic vesicle (which see, under prostatic). Also called utriculus masculinus, utriculus hominis, utriculus urethræ, vagina masculina, sinus prostaticus, sinus pocularis, and vesicula prostatica. — Uterus unicornis, a defective uterus resulting from absence or arrested development of one Müllerian duct, in consequence of which but one lateral half of the uterus has been formed.

Utetheisa (ū-te-thī'sạ), n. [NL. (Hübner, 1816).] A genus of bombycoid moths, of the family Lithosiidæ, containing a few beautifully colored species of moderate size, Utetheisa bella.

having the antennæ simple in both sexes. The genus is represented in all quarters of the globe, U. pul- chella alone occurring in Europe, Asia, Africa, and Australia. U. (Deiopeia) bella is a common North American species of a crimson color with white and black spots, whose larva feeds upon plants of the genera Myrica, Lespedeza, Crotalaria, and Prunus.

Utgard (út'gärd), n. [< Icel. útgarthar, the outer building, the abode of the giant Utgartha Loki; < út, out, + garthr, a yard: see garth[1] and yard. Cf. Midgard.] In Scand. myth., the abode of the giants; the realm of Utgard-Loki.

utia (ö'ti-ä), n. [Taino (W. Ind.) utia, etc.] A West Indian rodent of the genus Capromys.

utile† (ū'til), a. [< F. utile = Sp. Pg. util = It. utile, < L. utilis, serviceable, useful, < uti, use: see use[1].] Useful; profitable; beneficial.

The boke of Nurture for men, seruauntes, and chyldren, with Stans puer ad mensam, newly corrected, very vtyle and necessary vnto all youth.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. lxxxvii.

utilisable, utilisation, etc. See utilizable, etc.

utilitarian (ū-til-i-tā'ri-an), a. and n. [< utility + -arian. Cf. F. utilitaire.] I. a. Consisting in or pertaining to utility; having regard to utility rather than beauty and the like; specifically, making the greatest good of the greatest number the prime consideration. See the quotations.

It was in the winter of 1822–23 that I formed the plan of a little society, to be composed of young men agreeing in fundamental principles — acknowledging Utility as their standard in ethics and politics. . . . The fact would hardly be worth mentioning, but for the circumstance that the name I gave to the society I had planned was the Utilitarian Society. It was the first time that any one had taken the title of utilitarian, and the term made its way into the language from this humble source. I did not invent the word, but found it in one of Galt's novels, "The Annals of the Parish." J. S. Mill.

The pursuit of such happiness is taught by the utilitarian philosophy, a phrase used by Bentham himself in 1802, and therefore not invented by Mr. J. S. Mill, as he supposed, in 1823. Encyc. Brit., II. 576.

II. n. One who holds the doctrine of utilitarianism.

I told my people that I thought they had more sense than to secede from Christianity to become Utilitarians; for that it would be a confession of ignorance of the faith they deserted, seeing that it was the main duty inculcated by our religion to do all in morals and manners to which the newfangled doctrine of utility pretended.
Galt, Annals of the Parish (1821), xxxv.

utilitarianism (ū-til-i-tā'ri-an-izm), n. [< utilitarian + -ism.] The doctrine that the greatest happiness of the greatest number should be the sole aim of all public action, together with the hedonistic theory of ethics, upon which this doctrine rests. Utilitarianism originated with the marquis Cesare Bonesana Beccaria (1735–93), but its great master was Jeremy Bentham (1748–1832). He held that the sole possible rational motive is the expectation of pleasure, as measured by the intensity, propinquity, and duration of the pleasure, and the strength of the expectation. Utilitarian ethics, however, does not insist that such considerations need or ought to determine action in special cases, but only that the rules of morals should be founded upon them. These views greatly, and advantageously, influenced ethical thought and legislation in France, England, and the United States.

utilitarianize (ū-til-i-tā'ri-an-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. utilitarianized, ppr. utilitarianizing. [< utilitarian + -ize.] To act as a utilitarian toward; cause to serve a utilitarian purpose. [Rare.]

Matter-of-fact people, . . . who utilitarianize everything. Mrs. C. Meredith, My Home in Tasmania.

★utility (ū-til'i-ti), n.; pl. utilities (-tiz). [< ME. utilitee, utylite, < OF. utilite, F. utilité = Sp. utilidad = Pg. utilidade = It. utilità, < L. utilita(t-)s, usefulness, serviceableness, profit, < utilis, useful: see utile.] 1. The character of being useful; usefulness; profitableness; the state of being serviceable or conducive to some desirable or valuable end.

Rootes smale of noon utilitee
Cutte of for lettyng of fertilitee.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 79.

By utility is meant that property in any object whereby it tends to produce benefit, advantage, pleasure, good, or happiness. Jevons, Pol. Econ., p. 42.

An undertaking of enormous labour, and yet of only very partial utility.
Fitzedward Hall, Modern English, p. 36.

2. Use; profit.

That money growyng of suche talagis be in the kepyng of iiii. sad men and trewe, and that to be chosen, and out of their kepyng for necessites and vtylites of the same cite, and not odur wyse to be spent.
Arnold's Chron. (1502), p. 6.

3. A useful thing.

What we produce, or desire to produce, is always, as M. Say rightly terms it, an utility. Labour is not creative of objects, but of utilities. J. S. Mill, Pol. Econ., I. iii. § 1.

Particular utility†. See particular. — Responsible utility. See responsible. = Syn. 1. Advantage, Benefit, etc. See advantage and benefit.

utility-man (ū-til'i-ti-man), n. In theat. lang., an actor of the smallest parts in a play. A supernumerary is called a utility-man, or is said to have gone into the "utility," when he has a part with words given him.

utilizable (ū'ti-lī-za-bl), a. [< utilize + -able.] Capable of being utilized. Also spelled utilisable.

utilization (ū"ti-li-zā'shon), n. [< utilize + -ation.] The act of utilizing or turning to account, or the state of being utilized. Also spelled utilisation.

A man of genius, but of genius that evaded utilization.
Lowell, Fireside Travels, p. 63.

utilize (ū'ti-līz), v. t.; pret. and pp. utilized, ppr. utilizing. [= F. utiliser = Sp. Pg. utilizar = It. utilizzare; as utile + -ize.] To turn to profitable account or use; make useful; make use of: as, to utilize a stream for driving machinery. Also spelled utilise.

A variety of new compounds and combinations of words [are contained in Barlow's "Columbiad"] . . . as, to utilise; to vagrate, &c. Edinburgh Rev., XV. 28.

In the Edinburgh Review for 1809 . . . exception is taken to . . . utilize. . . . Utilize, a word both useful and readily intelligible, was very slow in becoming naturalized. Fitzedward Hall, Modern English, p. 128.

utilizer (ū'ti-lī-zėr), n. [< utilize + -er[1].] One who or that which utilizes. Also spelled utiliser.

ut infra (ut in'frä). [L.: ut, as; infra, below: see infra-.] As below.

uti possidetis (ū'ti pos-i-dē'tis). [L.: uti = ut, as; possidetis, 2d pers. pl. pres. ind. of possidere, possess: see possess.] 1. An interdict of the civil law by which a person who was in possession of an immovable was protected against any disturbance of his possession. It could also be used where there was a suit pending about the title, in order to determine with whom the possession should remain during the suit. Only the possessor animo domini was protected, except in a few cases where the protection of the interdict was extended to certain persons who had the mere physical possession. The question of good faith was as a rule unimportant, except that if the possession had been acquired by force, or by stealth, or as a mere precarium from the defendant, the interdict could not be used against him, but the defendant could not object that the possession had been acquired in this way from a third person. This interdict and the corresponding one for movables were called retinendæ possessionis (for retaining possession), as they were granted (except in some cases, about which the commentators differ) only to persons who had not lost their possession, but had merely been disturbed in it.

2. In international law, the basis or principle of a treaty which leaves belligerent parties in possession of what they have acquired by their arms during the war.

utist†, n. See utas.

utlagare†, n. [< ML. utlagaria, outlawry: see outlawry.] Outlawry.

And anon as the seide utlagare was certyfyed, my Lord Tresorer graunted the seid vij. c. marc to my Lord of Norffolk, for the arrerag of hys sowde qeyl he was in Scotland.
Paston Letters, I. 41.

utland†, n. and a. Same as outland.

utlary†, utlaury†, n. [< ML. utlaria*, utlagaria, outlawry: see outlawry.] Outlawry. Camden, Remains, Surnames.

utlegation† (ut-lē-gā'shon), n. [For utlagation*, < ML. utlagatio(n-), < utlagare, outlaw: see outlaw, v.] The act of outlawing; outlawry. S. Butler, Hudibras, III. i. 205.

utmost (ut'mōst), a. and n. [< ME. utmest, utemest, utemæste, outemeste, < AS. utemest, ytmest, ytemest, < út, out, + double superl. suffix -m-est: see out and -most. Cf. outmost, a doublet of utmost; cf. also uttermost.] I. a. superl. 1. Being at the furthest point or extremity or bound; furthest; extreme; last.

Take you off his vtmost weed, and beholde the comelinesse, beautie, and riches which lie hid within his inward sense and sentence. Hakluyt's Voyages, To the Reader.

Many wise men have miscarried in praising great designes before the utmost event.

Hints and glimpses, germs and crude essays at a system, is the utmost they pretend to.
Lamb, Imperfect Sympathies.

To do one's utmost, to do all one can.

Bigoted and intolerant Protestant legislators did their little utmost to oppress their Roman Catholic fellow-subjects, even in Ireland.
Ashton, Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, II. 132.

Utopia (ū-tō'pi-ä), n. [= F. Utopie; < NL. Utopia (see def.), lit. 'Nowhere,' < Gr. οὐ, no, not, + τόπος, place, spot.] 1. An imaginary island, described by Sir Thomas More in a work entitled "Utopia," published in 1516, as enjoying the utmost perfection in law, politics, etc. Hence — 2. [l. c.] A place or state of ideal perfection.

Unionists charged Socialism with incoherent raving about impossible utopias, whilst doing nothing practical to protect any single trade.
Nineteenth Century, XXVI. 725.

3. Any imaginary region.

Some say it [the Phœnix] liveth in Aethiopia, others in Arabia, some in Aegypt, others in India, and some I thinke in Utopia, for such must that be which is described by Lactantius — that is, which neither was singed in the combustion of Phaeton, or overwhelmed by the inundation of Deucalion. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 12.

4. In entom., a genus of coleopterous insects. Thomson, 1864.

Utopian (ū-tō'pi-an), a. and n. [< Utopia + -an.] I. a. 1. Of, pertaining to, or resembling Utopia. — 2. [l. c.] Founded upon or involving imaginary or ideal perfection; chimerical.

Utopian parity is a kind of government to be wished for, rather than effected.
Burton, Anat. of Mel., To the Reader, p. 64.

3. [l. c.] Belonging to no locality: as, "titular and utopian bishops," Bingham, Antiquities, iv. 6.

II. n. 1. An inhabitant of Utopia.

Such subtile opinions as few but Utopians are likely to fall into we in this climate do not greatly fear.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity.

2. [l. c.] One who forms or favors schemes supposed to lead to a state of perfect happiness, justice, virtue, etc.; an ardent but impractical political or social reformer; an optimist.

utopianism (ū-tō'pi-an-izm), n. [< utopian + -ism.] The characteristic views or bent of mind of a utopian; ideas founded on or relating to ideal social perfectibility; optimism.

Utopianism: that is another of the devil's pet words. I believe the quiet admission which we are all of us so ready to make, that because things have long been wrong, it is impossible they should ever be right, is one of the most fatal sources of misery and crime.
Ruskin, Architecture and Painting, ii.

utopianizer (ū-tō'pi-an-ī-zėr), n. [< utopian + -iz-er.] Same as utopian, n., 2. Southey, The Doctor, ccxli. Also spelled utopianiser. [Rare.]

utopiast (ū-tō'pi-ast), n. [< utopia + -ast.] A utopian. [Rare.]

But it is the weakness of Utopiasts of every class to place themselves outside the pale of their own system.
Westminster Rev., CXXVII. 130.

utopical† (ū-top'i-kal), a. [< utopia (see Utopia) + -ic-al.] Utopian. Ep. Hall, Works, II. 368.

utopism (ū'tō-pizm), n. [< utopia + -ism.] Utopianism. [Rare.]

It is utopism to believe that the state will have more unity, more harmony, more patriotism, because you have suppressed the family and property. Cyc. Pol. Sci., III. 258.

utopist (ū'tō-pist), n. [< utopia + -ist.] A utopian; an optimist.

Like the utopists of modern days, Plato has developed an a priori theory of what the State should be.
G. H. Lewes, History of Philosophy (ed. 1880), I. 273.

Utraquism (ū'tra-kwizm), n. [< L. utraque, neut. pl. of uterque, both, one and the other, also each, either (< uter, each, either (see whether[1]), + -que, and), + -ism.] The doctrines of the Utraquists or Calixtines, whose chief tenet was that communicants should partake in both kinds (that is, of the cup as well as of the bread) in the Lord's Supper. See Calixtine[1].

Utraquist (ū'tra-kwist), n. [< Utraqu(ism) + -ist.] One of the Calixtines, or conservative Hussites. See Calixtine[1].

Utrecht velvet. See velvet.

utricle (ū'tri-kl), n. [< F. utricule, < L. utriculus, a little leather bag or bottle, also (only in Pliny) a hull or husk of grain, a bud or calycle of a flower, the abdomen of bees, a little uterus (confused with ŭterus, womb), dim. of ūter, a leather bag or bottle.] 1. A small sac, cyst, bag, or reservoir of the body; an ordinary histological cell. — 2. The common sinus of the inner ear; the larger of two sacs in the vestibule of the membranous labyrinth of the ear (the smaller one being the saccule), lodged in the fovea hemielliptica, of oval and laterally compressed shape, communicating with the openings of the membranous semicircular canals, and indirectly also with the saccule. Also called sacculus communis, sacculus hemiellipticus, sacculus semiovalis, utriculus vestibuli.—3. In bot., a seed-vessel consisting of a very thin loose pericarp, inclosing a single seed; any thin bottle-like or bladder-like body, as the perigynium of Carex. See cuts under Sarcobatus and perigynium. Also utriculus in all senses.—Internal or primordial utricle. See primordial.—Utricle of the urethra. Same as prostatic vesicle (which see, under prostatic). For other names, see uterus masculinus, under uterus.—Utricle of the vestibule. See ★def. 2.

utricular (ū-trik′ū-lär), a. [= F. utriculaire = Sp. Pg. utricular; cf. L. utricularius, a bagpiper, a ferryman, lit. pertaining to a bag, < L. utriculus, a leather bag: see utricle.] 1. Of or pertaining to a utricle, in any sense; resembling a utricle; forming a utricle, or having utricles.—2. Resembling a utricle or bag: specifically applied in chemistry to the condition of certain substances, as sulphur, the vapor of which, on coming in contact with cold bodies, condenses in the form of globules, composed of a soft external pellicle filled with liquid.

Utricularia (ū-trik-ū-lā′ri-ạ), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1735), < L. utriculus, a bag: see utricle.] A remarkable genus of sympetalous plants, the bladderworts, of the family Pinguiculaceæ, the type of the tribe Utricularieæ. They are characterized by having a two-parted calyx with entire segments. The genus comprises about 150 species, or nearly the entire family, principally tropical, and American or Australian, some of them widely distributed over the world. Their characteristic habit is that of elongated floating rootless stems, clothed with close whorls of capillary and repeatedly forking green leaves, by some considered as branches, in most cases elegantly dissected and fringe-like. These become massed together at the apex into a small, bright-green roundish ball or winter-bud. The flowers are solitary or racemed, two-lipped, strongly personate and spurred, usually yellow, and borne on mostly naked scapes projecting from the water; they resemble otherwise those of the other personate families, but have a globose free central placenta, like the Primulaceæ. Most species produce great numbers of small, obliquely ovoid bladders, formed of a thin, delicate membrane, opening at the smaller end by a very elastic valvular lid, and covered within by projecting quadrifid processes, serving as absorbent organs, and each composed of four divergent arms mounted on a short pedicel. The bladders serve, like various appendages in other insectivorous plants, for the absorption of soft animal matter, forming traps for minute water-insects, larvæ, entomostracans, and tardigrades. Other species are terrestrial, growing upon moist earth, and often bearing a rosette of linear or spatulate leaves, or sometimes covered with bladders, as the aquatic species. A few species are epiphytes, and produce bladders on multifid rhizomes, as in U. montana of tropical America. In this and several other species the plant also forms numerous tubers, which serve as reservoirs of water, and enable these, unlike all other species, to grow in dry places. There are 18 species in the United States, of which U. vulgaris is the most widely distributed. U. clandestina, a common coast species, bears numerous globose whitish clistogamous flowers, besides the normal ones, which are broadly personate and yellow. Two species, chiefly of the Atlantic coast, U. purpurea and U. resupinata, are exceptional in their purple flowers. U. nelumbifolia of Brazil is singular in its growing only in water lodged in the dilated leaf-bases of a large Tillandsia, and propagating not only by seeds, but also by runners, which grow from one host plant to the next.

utriculate (ū-trik′ū-lāt), a. [< NL. utriculatus, < L. utriculus, a little bag: see utricle.] Having a utricle; formed into a utricle; utricular.

utriculi, n. Plural of utriculus.

utriculiferous (ū-trik-ū-lif′e-rus), a. [< L. utriculus, a little bag, + ferre = E. bear[1].] In bot., bearing or producing utricles or bladders.

utriculiform (ū-trik′ū-li-fôrm), a. [< L. utriculus, a little bag (see utricle), + forma, form: see form.] In bot., having the form of a utricle; utricular.

utriculoid (ū-trik′ū-loid), a. [< L. utriculus, a little bag, + Gr. εἶδος, form.] Same as utriculiform.

utriculose (ū-trik′ū-lōs), a. [< L. utriculus, a little bag: see utricle.] In bot., same as ★utricular.

utriculus (ū-trik′ū-lus), n.; pl. utriculi (-lī). [NL.: see utricle.] In anat., zoöl., and bot., same as utricle.

The differences which are seen in it are partly due to the way in which the two cavities of the vestibule, the utriculus and sacculus, are connected together, and to the course taken by the semicircular canals which spring from the former. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 535.

Utriculus hominis, utriculus masculinus. Same as uterus masculinus. See prostatic vesicle, under prostatic.—Utriculus prostaticus. Same as prostatic sinus (which see, under prostatic).—Utriculus urethræ, the prostatic vesicle.—Utriculus vestibuli. Same as utricle, 2.

utriform (ū′tri-fôrm), a. [< L. uter, a leather bottle, + forma, form.] Shaped like a leather bottle.

They may be leathern-bottle-shaped (utriform).

Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 2816.

These very words
I've heard him utter to his son-in-law.
Shak., Hen. VIII., i. 2. 136.

Stay, sister, I would utter to you a business,
But I am very loath.
Webster, Devil's Law-Case, iii. 3.

In reason's ear they all rejoice,
And utter forth a glorious voice.
Addison, Ode, Spectator, No. 465.

4. In law, to deliver, or offer to deliver, as an unlawful thing for an unlawful purpose.—Syn. 3. Utter, Enunciate, Pronounce, Deliver, express, broach. Utter is the most general of the italicized words; it applies to any audible voice: as, to utter a sigh, a shriek, an exclamation. The rest apply to words. Enunciate expresses careful utterance, meaning that each sound or word is made completely audible: as, enunciate your words distinctly. Pronounce applies to units of speech: as, he cannot pronounce the letter "r"; he pronounces his words indistinctly; he pronounced an oration at the grave; he pronounced the sentence of death: the last two of these imply a solemn and formal utterance. Deliver refers to the whole speech, including not only utterance, but whatever there may be of help from skilful management of the voice, gesture, etc.: as, "a poor speech well delivered is generally more effective than a good speech badly delivered." Deliver still has, however, sometimes its old sense of simply uttering or making known in any way.

utter† (ut′ėr), adv. [< utter, a.] 1. Outside; on the outside; out.

The portir with his pikis tho put him vttere, uva (ū'vą), n. [NL., < L. uva, a grape, also a cluster of grapes, a bunch, also the soft palate, the uvula.] In bot., a name given to such succulent indehiscent fruits as have a central placenta.

Uvaria (ū-vā'ri-ą), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), so called with ref. to the berries, < L. uva, a grape.] A genus of plants, type of the tribe Uvarieæ in the family Anonaceæ. They are characterized by having flowers with valvate sepals, numerous appendaged stamens, many carpels, and many ovules; the receptacle and sometimes the stamens are truncate. The genus includes about 93 species, natives of tropical Asia, tropical and South Africa, and Australia. They are climbing or sarmentose shrubs, with hairy stems and leaves, and bisexual flowers, usually opposite the leaves. The corolla is frequently brown, greenish, or purple, and often densely velvety. The flowers of several species of India are very fragrant and somewhat showy, reaching in U. dulcis two inches and in U. purpurea three inches in diameter. The aromatic roots of U. Narum, a large woody climber with shining leaves and scarlet fruit, are used in India as a febrifuge, and by distillation yield a fragrant greenish oil. Some produce an edible fruit, as U. Zeylanica and U. macrophylla of India. U. Caffra, with laurel-like leaves, and fleshy berries resembling cherries, occurs in Natal, and two other extra-limital species are Australian. Oxandra virgata, a West Indian tree known as lancewood, was formerly referred to this genus by some authors; and many other former American species are now assigned to Cananga. Compare also Unona and Asimina.

Uvarieæ (ū-vą-rī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Reichenbach, 1837), < Uvaria + -eæ.] A tribe of plants, of the family Anonaceæ. It includes 19 genera, all tropical, of which Uvaria is the type. The only other large genera, Cananga and Aberemoa, are American; the others are principally East Indian, with 4 monotypic genera in Borneo. In Engler's latest revisions he makes this a subtribe, the Uvariinæ, and includes the Unoneæ (Unoninæ) with it in a large tribe which takes the name Uvarieæ. See Unoneæ.

uvarovite (ö-var'ō-vīt), n. [Named after S. S. Uvarov, a Russian statesman and author (1785–1855).] Chrome-garnet, an emerald-green variety of garnet containing chromium sesquioxid. Also written uwarowite, ouvarovite.

uvea (ū'vē-ą), n. [NL., < L. uva, a grape, a cluster of grapes: see uva.] 1. The vascular tunic of the eye; the iris, ciliary body, and choroid taken collectively. Also called tunica uvea and uveal tract.—2. The dark choroid coat of the eye. See cut under *eye*1.

uveal (ū'vē-ąl), a. [< uvea + -al.] Of or relating to the uvea.—Uveal tract. Same as uvea, 1.

We may regard the iris as the anterior termination of the ciliary body and choroid, the whole forming, in reality, one tissue, the uveal tract. Wells, Diseases of Eye, p. 144.

uveous (ū'vē-us), a. [< L. uva, a grape, a cluster of grapes (see uva), + -e-ous.] 1. Resembling a grape or a bunch of grapes. Imp. Dict.—2. In anat., same as uveal.

The uveous coat or iris of the eye hath a musculous power, and can dilate and contract that round hole in it called the pupil or sight of the eye.
Ray, Works of Creation, ii.

uvula (ū'vū-lą), n. [NL., dim. of L. uva, the uvula, a particular use of uva, a grape, a cluster of grapes: see uva.] 1. A small free conical body, projecting downward and backward from the middle of the pendulous margin of the soft palate, composed of the uvular muscles covered by mucous membrane. See cuts under tonsil and mouth.—2. A prominent section of the inferior vermiform process of the cerebellum, in advance of the pyramid, between the two lateral lobes known as the amygdalæ or tonsils: so called from being likened to the uvula of the palate.—3. A slight projection of mucous membrane from the bladder into the cystic orifice of the urethra; the uvula vesicæ, luette vésicale, or uvula of the bladder.—Azygos uvulæ. Same as musculus uvulæ.—Musculus uvulæ, the muscle that forms, with its fellow, the fleshy part of the uvula. It arises from the posterior nasal spine. Also called uvularis.—Uvula-spoon, a surgical instrument like a spoon, designed to be held just under the uvula, for the purpose of conveying any substance into the cavity behind.—Vesical uvula, the uvula vesicæ. See def. 3.

uvular (ū'vū-lär), a. [< uvula + *-ar*3.] 1. Of or pertaining to the uvula: as, uvular mucous membrane; uvular movements.—2. Made with the uvula: said of r when produced by vibration of the uvula instead of by that of the tongue-tip, as commonly in parts of France and Germany and elsewhere.

E must be regarded here as a partial assimilation of the i to the following uvular r.
Amer. Jour. Philol., VIII. 285.

Uvular muscle. Same as musculus uvulæ. See uvula.

uvulares, n. Plural of uvularis.

Uvularia (ū-vū-lā'ri-ą), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737); used earlier, by Brunfels, 1530, for the related Ruscus Hypoglossum, and by Bock, 1552, for a Campanula); so called from the pendulous flower, < NL. uvula, the soft palate: see uvula.] A genus of melanthiaceous plants, of the tribe Uvularieæ. They are characterized by having a slightly branched stem, and terminal pendulous flowers with erect and connivent or finally spreading segments. The 6 species are all natives of the eastern and central United States, 2 of them southern, the others extending into Canada. They are delicate plants growing from a thick or creeping rootstock, with erect stems, at first wrapped below in a few dry sheaths, above bearing alternate sessile or perfoliate ovate and lanceolate leaves. The solitary or twin flowers hang from recurving pedicels, and are followed by triangular-ovoid capsules. They are known as bellwort, especially the perfoliate species, U. perfoliata and U. grandiflora, which are widely distributed. The sessile-leaved species, U. sessilifolia, U. puberula, and U. Floridana, are now by some separated as a genus, Oakesiella. See figures under sessile, perfoliate, and stoma.

uxoriously (uk-sō'ri-us-li), adv. In an uxorious manner; with foolish or doting fondness for a wife.

If thou art thus uxoriously inclin'd
To bear thy bondage with a willing mind, Prepare thy neck. Dryden, tr. of Juvenal, vi. 292.

uxoriousness (uk-sō'ri-us-nes), n. The state or character of being uxorious; connubial dotage, foolish fondness for a wife.

Uzbeg, Usbeg (uz'-, us'beg), n. [Tatar.] A member of a Turkish race, of mixed origin, resident in central Asia.

uzzard (uz'ärd), n. A dialectal form of *izzard*1. Halliwell.

uzzle (uz'l), n. A dialectal form of ouzel.

★ 1. This character, the twenty-second in our alphabet, is (see U) the older form of the character U, having been long used equivalently with the latter, and only recently strictly distinguished from it as the representative of a different sound. The words beginning respectively with U and V, like those beginning with I and J, were, till not many years ago, mingled together in dictionaries. In our present practice, V represents always and in all situations a fricative sound, corresponding as sonant or voiced utterance to f as surd or breathed; it is the rustling made by forcing the intonated breath out between the surface of the lower lip and the edges of the upper front teeth, laid closely upon it. A purely labial v (as f: see F), made without aid from the teeth, is found in some languages. This sound is also almost the exclusive property of the v-sign; the number of words, as Stephen, nephew, in which it is written otherwise is extremely small, and in these words the ph is an etymological "restoration" (the old and normal English forms being Steven, nevew). It is a frequent element in our utterance, making on an average over two and a third per cent. of it (the f-sound only two per cent.). As initial, it is almost solely of Romanic (French-Latin) origin, altered in pronunciation from the semi-vowel or w-sound, which belonged to the same sign in Roman use (see W). At the end of a word (where, however, it is never written without a following e), it is found in many words of Germanic origin, often alternating with its surd counterpart f, as in wife, wives, half, halve, etc.

2. As a Roman numeral, V stands for 5; with a dash over it (V̄), 5,000.—3. [l. c.] An abbreviation of velocity (in physics); verb; verse; versus (in law); vert (in heraldry); vision (in medicine); of verte, violino, voce, and volta (in music); of ventral (fin), etc.—4. The chemical symbol of vanadium.

V² (vē). n. [From the letter V.] A five-dollar bill: so called from the character V which is conspicuous upon it. [Colloq., U. S.]

va (vä). [< It. va (= F. va), go, go on, also vada (< L. vadere, go), used as impv. 2d pers. sing. of andare = F. aller, go: see wade.] In music, go on; continue: as, va crescendo, go on increasing the strength of tone; va rallentando, continue dragging the time.

vaagmar (väg′mär), n. [< Icel. vāg-meri, a kind of flounder, 'wave-mare,' < vāg, wave (see *waw*¹), + meri, mare: see *mare*¹.] The dealfish.

vaalite (vä′līt), n. [< Vaal, a river in South Africa, + *-ite*².] A kind of vermiculite occasionally found associated with the diamond at the diggings in South Africa. It is probably an altered form of a mica (biotite) belonging to the original peridotite.

vacancet (vā′kạns), n. [< F. vacance = Sp. Pg. vacancia = It. vacanzia, vacanza, < ML. vacantia, empty place, vacancy, vacation, < L. vacan(t-)s, empty, vacant: see vacant.] Vacation. [Obsolete Scotch.]

> The consistory had no vacance at this Yool, but had little to do.
> Spalding, Hist. Troubles in Scotland, i. 331. (Jamieson.) vacancy (vā′kạn-si), n.; pl. vacancies (-siz). [As vacance (see -cy).] 1. The state of being vacant, empty, or unoccupied.

> The inquisitive, in my opinion, are such merely from a vacancy in their own imaginations.
> Steele, Spectator, No. 282.

2. Specifically, emptiness of mind; idleness; listlessness.

> All dispositions to idleness or vacancy, even before they grow habits, are dangerous.
> Sir H. Wotton, Reliquiæ, p. 85.
>
> At chesse they will play all the day long, a sport that agreeth well with their sedentary vacancy.
> Sandys, Travailes, p. 50.

3. That which is vacant or unoccupied. Specifically— (a) Empty space.

> Alas, how is 't with you,
> That you do bend your eye on vacancy?
> Shak., Hamlet, iii. 4. 117.

(b) An intermediate space; a gap; a chasm.

> In the vacancy
> 'Twixt the wall and me.
> Browning, Mesmerism.

(c) An interval of time not devoted to the ordinary duties or business of life; unoccupied, unemployed, or leisure time; holiday time; vacation; relaxation.

> No interim, not a minute's vacancy.
> Shak., T. N., v. 1. 98.
> In his youth he had no Teachers, in his middle Age so little vacancy from the Wars and the cares of his Kingdome. Milton, Hist. Eng., v.

(d) An unoccupied or unfilled post, position, or office: as, a vacancy in the judicial bench.

> We went to see the Conclave, where, during vacancy, the Cardinals are shut up till they are agreed upon a new election. Evelyn, Diary, Jan. 18, 1645.

vacant (vā′kạnt), a. [Early mod. E. also vacaunt; < ME. vacaunt, < OF. (and F.) vacant = Sp. Pg. It. vacante, < L. vacan(t-)s, empty, vacant, ppr. of vacare, be empty, free, or unoccupied: see vacate.] 1. Having no contents; empty; unfilled; void; devoid; destitute: as, a vacant space; a vacant room.

> Being of those virtues vacant.
> Shak., Hen. VIII., v. 1. 126.
>
> A man could not perceive any vacant or wast place under the Alpes, but all beset with vines.
> Coryat, Crudities, I. 81.

2. Not occupied or filled with an incumbent or tenant; unoccupied.

> Special dignities, which vacant lie
> For thy best use and wearing.
> Shak., T. of A., v. 1. 145.
>
> By . . . [Pelham's] death, the highest post to which an English subject can aspire was left vacant.
> Macaulay, William Pitt.

3. Not engaged or filled with business or care; unemployed; unoccupied; free; disengaged; idle: as, vacant hours.

> Alexander, in tymes vacaunt from bataile, delyted in that maner huntinge. Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, i. 18.
>
> The loud laugh that spoke the vacant mind.
> Goldsmith, Des. Vil., l. 122.
>
> Absence of occupation is not rest;
> A mind quite vacant is a mind distress'd.
> Cowper, Retirement, l. 624.

4. Characterized by or proceeding from idleness or absence of mental occupation.

> Every morning waked us to a repetition of toil; but the evening repaid it with vacant hilarity. Goldsmith, Vicar, v.

5. Free from thought; not given to thinking, study, reflection, or the like; thoughtless.

> You, who used to be so gay, so open, so vacant!
> Steele, Conscious Lovers, ii. 1.

6. Lacking, or appearing to lack, intelligence; stupid; inane.

> Rip stared in vacant stupidity.
> Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 59.

7. In law: (a) Not filled; unoccupied: as, a vacant office. (b) Empty: as, a vacant house. In the law of fire-insurance a house may be unoccupied, and yet not be deemed vacant. (c) Abandoned; having no heir: as, vacant effects or goods.—Vacant cylinder, lot, possession. See the nouns.—Syn. 1-4. Vacant, Empty, Void, Devoid. Void and devoid are now used in a physical sense only in poetic or elevated diction; void is often used of laws, legal instruments, and the like: as, the will or deed or law was pronounced null and void. Devoid is now always followed by of: as, devoid of reason; a mind devoid of ideas. Vacant and empty are primarily physical: as, an empty box; a vacant lot. Empty is much the more general: it applies to that which contains nothing, whether previously filled or not: as, an empty bottle, drawer, nest, head. Vacant applies to that which has been filled or occupied, or is intended or is ready or needs to be filled or occupied: as, a vacant throne, chair, space, office, mind: an empty room has no furniture in it a vacant room is one that is free for occupation. Vacant is a word of some dignity, and is therefore not used of the plainest things: we do not speak of a vacant box or bottle.

vacantly (vā′kạnt-li), adv. In a vacant manner; idly.

vacate (vā′kāt), v.; pret. and pp. vacated, ppr. vacating. [< L. vacatus, pp. of vacare, be empty or vacant. From the same L. verb are ult. E. vacant, vacuous, vacuum, etc. Cf. vain.] I. trans. 1. To make vacant; cause to be empty; quit the occupancy or possession of; leave empty or unoccupied: as, James II. vacated the throne.—2. To annul; make void; make of no authority or validity.

> That after-Act, vacateing the autoritie of the precedent.
> Eikon Basilike, p. 10.
> If a man insures his life, this killing himself vacates the bargain. Walpole, Letters, II. 418.

3. To defeat the purpose of; make void of meaning; make useless.

> He vacates my revenge. Dryden, Don Sebastian, ii. 1.

II. intrans. To quit; leave.

> I to pay four dollars and twenty-five cents to-night, he to vacate at five to-morrow morning.
> Thoreau, Walden, p. 48.

★ vacation (vā-kā′shọn), n. [< ME. vacacion, vacacioun, < OF. vacacion, vacation, F. vacation = Pr. vaccatio = Sp. vacación = Pg. vacação = It. vacazione, < L. vacatio(n-), leisure, < vacare, pp. vacatus, be empty, free, or unoccupied: see vacate.] 1. The act of vacating. Specifically— (a) The act of leaving without an occupant: as, the vacation of an office. (b) The act of making void, vacant, or of no validity: as, the vacation of a charter.

2. A space of time, or a condition, in which there is an intermission of a stated employment or procedure; a stated interval in a round of duties; a holiday.

> To raise Recruits, and draw new Forces down,
> Thus, in the dead Vacation of the Town.
> Congreve, Pyrrhus, Prol.

Specifically—(a) In law, temporary cessation of judicial proceedings; the space of time between the end of one term of court and the beginning of the next; the period during which a court holds no sessions; recess; non-term. In England the vacations are—Christmas vacation, commencing on December 24th and ending January 6th; Easter vacation, commencing on Good Friday and ending on Easter Tuesday; Whitsun vacation, commencing on the Saturday before and ending on the Tuesday after Whitsunday; and the long vacation, commencing on August 13th and ending on October 23d.

> Why should not conscience have vacation
> As well as other courts o' th' nation?
> S. Butler, Hudibras, II. ii. 317.

(b) The intermission of the regular studies of an educational institution of any kind, when the students have a recess; holidays: as, the summer vacation.

3. The act of becoming vacant; avoidance: said especially of a see or other spiritual dignity.—4†. Freedom from duty; leisure time.

> Whan he hadde leyser and vacacioun
> From oother worldly occupacioun.
> Chaucer, Prol. to Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 683.

vacationist (vā-kā′shọn-ist), n. [< vacation + -ist.] One who is taking a vacation; especially, one who is journeying for pleasure; an excursionist. [Colloq.]

vacationless (vā-kā′shọn-les), a. [< vacation + -less.] Without a vacation; deprived of a vacation.

vacatur (vā-kā′tėr), n. [< ML. vacatur, 3d pers. pres. ind. pass. of vacare, make void, trans. use of L. vacare, be empty or void: see vacate.] In law, the act of annulling or setting aside.

vaccary (vak′ạ-ri), n.; pl. vaccaries (-riz). [< ML. vaccaria, < L. vacca, a cow: see vaccine. Cf. vachery, a doublet of vaccary.] A cow-house, dairy, or cow-pasture. See vachery. [Prov. Eng.]

> At this time there were eleven vaccaries (places of pasture for cows) in Pendle Forest, and the herbage and agistments of each vaccary were valued to the lord at 10*s.*, or in all 110*s.* yearly. Baines, Hist. Lancashire, II. 25.

vaccigenous (vak-sij′e-nus), a. [Irreg. < vaccine + L. -gerere, carry.] Producing vaccine: applied to methods of cultivating vaccine virus, or to farms and institutions where the virus is produced in quantity.

vaccin (vak′sin), n. Same as vaccine.

vaccina (vak-sī′nạ), n. [NL., < L. vaccinus, of or from cows: see vaccine.] Same as vaccinia. Dunglison.

vaccinal (vak′si-nạl), a. [< vaccine + -al.] Of or relating to vaccine; caused by vaccination. Med. News, LII. 546.—Vaccinal erythema, a bright-red coloration of the skin occurring sometimes in connection with vaccinia.—Vaccinal fever, vaccinia, especially in its severer forms.—Vaccinal scar. Same as vaccine cicatrix (which see, under vaccine).

vaccinate (vak′si-nāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. vaccinated, ppr. vaccinating. [< vaccine + -ate[2]. Cf. F. vacciner = Sp. vacunar = Pg. vaccinar = It. vaccinare, vaccinate.] 1. To inoculate with the cowpox, by means of vaccine matter or lymph taken directly or indirectly from the cow, for the purpose of procuring immunity from smallpox or of mitigating its attack.—2. In a general sense, to inoculate with the modified virus of any specific disease, in order to produce that disease in a mild form or to prevent its attack.

vaccination (vak-si-nā′shọn), n. [= F. vaccination = Sp. vacunación = Pg. vaccinação = It. vaccinazione; as vaccinate + -ion.] In med., inoculation with vaccine, or the virus of cowpox, as a preventive of smallpox; in an extended sense, inoculation with the virus of any specific disease. The utility of vaccination with the virus of cowpox was discovered by Edward Jenner, an English surgeon, in the latter part of the eighteenth century, the first vaccination upon the human subject having been made in 1796. It consists in the introduction under the skin, or application to an abraded surface, usually on the upper arm or thigh, of a minute quantity of vaccine. This is followed, in a typical case, in about two days, by slight redness and swelling at the point of inoculation, and on the third or fourth day by the appearance of a vesicle filled with clear fluid, and umbilicated or depressed in the center. About the end of the eighth day a ring of inflammation, called the areola, begins to form around the base of the vesicle; it is usually hard, swollen, and painful. On the eleventh or twelfth day the inflammation begins to subside; the vesicle turns yellow, and then dries up and forms a crust or scab, which usually falls off about the end of the third week, leaving a permanent scar. The appearance of the areola is sometimes attended with rather severe constitutional disturbance, such as fever, headache, loss of appetite, swelling of the glands above the part, and a general feeling of malaise. The appearance of this eruption, more or less modified from rubbing of the clothes or from scratching, is the only certain evidence that vaccination has been successful, or has taken. See also vaccine and vaccinia.—Auto-vaccination, reinoculation of a person with virus taken from himself. This not infrequently occurs accidentally, the lymph from a ruptured vesicle being carried on the finger-nails and introduced at some other point.

vaccinationist (vak-si-nā′shọn-ist), n. [< vaccination + -ist.] One who favors the practice of vaccination. Lancet, 1890, I. 1084.

vaccination-scar (vak-si-nā′shọn-skär), n. Same as vaccine cicatrix (which see, under vaccine).

vaccinator (vak′si-nā-tọr), n. [= F. vaccinateur = Sp. vacunador = Pg. vaccinador = It. vaccinatore; as vaccinate + -or[1].] 1. One who vaccinates. H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 287. —2. A lancet or a scarificator employed in vaccination. See cut under lancet.

vaccine (vak′sin), a. and n. [< F. vaccin = Sp. vacuno = It. vaccino, vaccine (as a noun, F. vaccine = Sp. vacuna = Pg. vaccina = It. vaccina, < NL. vaccina), < L. vaccinus, of a cow, < vacca, a cow; prob. akin to Skt. √ vāç, cry, howl, low; cf. voice. Hence vaccinate, etc.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to cows; derived from cows: as, the vaccine disease, or cowpox.—2. Of or relating to vaccinia or vaccination.—Vaccine agent, in certain of the United States, a State officer whose duty it is to procure and distribute a supply of pure vaccine matter.—Vaccine cicatrix, the scar remaining after a successful vaccination. It is usually silvery-white, of an irregularly circular outline, slightly depressed below the level of the surrounding skin, and foveated, or having numerous shallow pits on its surface.—Vaccine lymph, matter, virus. Same as II., 1.

II. n. 1. The virus of cowpox or vaccinia, used in the process of vaccination as a preventive of smallpox. Two varieties of vaccine are in use: namely, the bovine, that which is obtained directly from the heifer, and the humanized, or that which is obtained from vesicles on the human subject. The vaccinia following inoculation with bovine virus is usually attended with more pronounced local inflammation and constitutional symptoms than is that produced by the humanized lymph. Vaccine, as employed for vaccination, is prepared in the shape of dried lymph on quills or small flat pieces of bone or ivory, of fluid lymph in closed capillary glass tubes, and of crusts. Also called vaccine lymph, matter, or virus.

2. In a general sense, the modified virus of any specific disease introduced into the body by inoculation, with a view to prevent or mitigate a threatened attack of that disease or to confer immunity against subsequent attacks.

Also vaccin.

vaccine-farm (vak′sin-färm), n. A place where vaccine virus is cultivated by the systematic inoculation of heifers.

vaccinella (vak-si-nel′ạ), n. Spurious vaccinia; an eruption which occasionally follows vaccination, but which is not true vaccinal eruption.

vaccine-point (vak′sin-point), n. A thin piece of bone or ivory, or a quill, sharpened at one end and coated with dried vaccine lymph. The inoculation may be made by abrading the skin with the sharp point, thus avoiding the use of a lancet.

vaccinia (vak-sin′i-ạ), n. [NL., < L. vaccinus, of or pertaining to a cow: see vaccine.] A specific eruptive disease occurring in cattle, especially in milch cows. It is characterized by an eruption, at first papular, then changing to vesicular, situated usually at the junction of the teats with the udder. The vesicle is umbilicated, the margin being more elevated than the center, and contains a clear yellowish fluid. The skin surrounding it is somewhat inflamed, reddish in color, and indurated. The vesicle increases in size up to about the tenth day, when the contents become more opaque, and a crust begins to form. This crust increases in size for a few days, and then dries up and falls off at about the end of the third week. During the height of the disease there may be a little fever and loss of appetite, and the yield of milk may be somewhat diminished; but in general the constitutional disturbance is slight. It is by inoculation with lymph taken from the vesicles in this disease as it occurs in the cow or in the human subject that immunity against smallpox is conferred upon man. See vaccination and vaccine. Also vaccina and cowpox.

Vacciniaceæ (vak-sin-i-ā′shē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1845), < Vaccinium + -aceæ.] An order of gamopetalous plants, of the cohort Ericales. It is distinguished from the related order Ericaceæ by the fact that the inferior ovary forms a fleshy fruit. It includes about 348 species, belonging to 27 genera (classed in two tribes, the Thibaudieæ and Euvaccinieæ), natives of moist mountain woods in temperate and cold regions, also numerous in tropical Asia and America, with 8 genera in islands of the Pacific. They are erect or prostrate shrubs or trees, often epiphytes, sometimes with tuberous or thickened stems, and frequently climbing over trees. The leaves are alternate or scattered, generally evergreen, and the flowers are usually in bracted racemes. Four genera occur in the United States, of which Vaccinium (the type), Gaylussacia, and Oxycoccus are the most important, producing the blueberries, huckleberries, and cranberries of the market; the other genus, Chiogenes, the snowberry, is transitional to the Ericaceæ, or heath family. See cuts under cranberry, huckleberry, and Vaccinium.

vacciniaceous (vak-sin-i-ā′shius), a. Belonging to or characteristic of the Vacciniaceæ.

vaccinic (vak-sin′ik), a. [< vaccine + -ic.] Of or pertaining to vaccine.

Vaccinieæ (vak-si-nī′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1813), < Vaccinium + -eæ.] A tribe of plants, of the order Vacciniaceæ, also known as Euvaccinieæ. The flowers are usually small, their substance delicate, and the filaments distinct. It includes 9 or 10 genera, of which Vaccinium is the type.

vaccinifer (vak-sin′i-fėr), n. [< NL. vaccina, vaccine, + L. ferre = E. bear[1].] 1. The source, either a person or an animal, of the vaccine virus.—2. An instrument used in vaccination. Quain, Med. Dict., p. 1724.

vacciniola (vak-si-nī′ọ-lạ), n. [NL., dim. of vaccinia, q. v.] A secondary eruption, resembling that at the site of inoculation, sometimes seen after vaccination.

vaccinist (vak′si-nist), n. [< vaccine + -ist.] 1. One who performs vaccination.—2. One who favors the practice of vaccination.

Vaccinium (vak-sin′i-um), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), < L. vaccinium, blueberry, whortleberry.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, type of the order Vacciniaceæ and of the tribe Euvaccinieæ; the blueberries. It is distinguished from Gaylussacia, the huckleberry genus, by the numerous ovules in each cell of the ovary and by sometimes having only eight stamens, Squaw-huckleberry (Vaccinium stamineum).

1, flowering branch; 2, branch with fruit; 3, a flower.

and from Oxycoccus, the cranberry genus, by usually having the anthers awned on the back. (See cut 7 under stamen, 4.) It includes about 110 species, inhabiting the temperate and frigid regions of the northern hemisphere and the mountains of the tropics. They are usually branching shrubs, rarely trees, a few epiphytic. The leaves are generally small, coriaceous, and evergreen, but sometimes membranaceous and deciduous; the flowers small, white, pink, or red, disposed in axillary or terminal racemes or axillary fascicles, rarely solitary, usually with bracts. Many of the species yield edible berries. (See whortleberry and blueberry, and compare huckleberry, cranberry, hurt[2], and hurtberry.) The 3 well-known circumpolar species, V. Myrtillus, V. uliginosum, and V. Vitis-Idæa, are the only species in Europe, the most important being V. Myrtillus, the whortleberry. V. uliginosum, the blueberry or bog-bilberry, a smaller shrub with terete branches and usually four-parted flowers, is common in northern Britain and in Canada. V. Vitis-Idæa, the cowberry or mountain-cranberry, with evergreen leaves and prostrate stems, yields an acid red berry, edible when cooked, and sometimes substituted for the cranberry; it ranges in America from New England to Point Barrow, 71° 19′ north. There are 10 or more species in Alaska, and 22 in the United States proper, classed in 4 distinct groups, of which the smaller are Vitis-Idæa, with ovate or globular corolla, and Batodendron, with open bell-shaped flowers, and berries little edible. (See farkleberry and squaw-huckleberry.) The blueberries, common species of the eastern United States and northward, forming the subgenus Cyanococcus, are replaced in the Rocky Mountains and Pacific States by the bilberries, species of Vaccinium proper, the typical section, which are themselves few and rare westward, but range more extensively in Canada. About 12 species occur in the northwestern United States, 3 of these and 10 others in the Southern States, 4 in the Rocky Mountain region, and 6 or more in Oregon or Nevada. Most species are low bushes; but V. arboreum, the farkleberry, sometimes reaches 25 feet in height, and V. corymbosum, the widely distributed blue huckleberry of the later summer market, is often 10 feet in height. The American cranberry, Oxycoccus macrocarpus, was formerly, and by some authors is still, referred to this genus.

vaccinization (vak-si-ni-zā′shọn), n. [< vaccine + -ize + -ation.] A very thorough method of vaccination, in which repeated inoculations are made until the vaccinal susceptibility is completely destroyed.

vaccinosyphilis (vak″si-nọ-sif′i-lis), n. [< vaccine + syphilis.] Syphilis transmitted by impure humanized vaccine or by infected instruments used in vaccination.

vachet, n. [ME., < OF. (and F.) vache = Sp. vaca = Pg. It. vacca, < L. vacca, a cow: see vaccine.] A cow; hence, a beast.

Therfore, thou vache, leve thyn old wrecchednesse.
Chaucer, Truth, l. 22.

vacher (va-shā′), n. [< F. vacher, OF. vachier, vaquier = Pr. vaquier = Sp. vaquero = Pg. vaqueiro = It. vaccaro, < ML. vaccarius, cowherd, < L. vacca, a cow: see vache and vaccine, and cf. vaccary, vachery.] Same as vaquero. S. De Vere, Americanisms, p. 108. [Rare.]

vachery (vash′ėr-i), n.; pl. vacheries (-iz). [< ME. vacherye, < OF. (and F.) vacherie, < ML. vaccaria, a cow-house, fem. of vaccarius*, pertaining to a cow: see vaccary, vacher.] A pen or inclosure for cows; also, a dairy. [Obsolete or provincial.]

Vacherye, or dayre. Vacaria. Prompt. Parv., p. 507.

Vaccary, alias Vachary (vaccaria), is a house or ground to keep Cows in, a Cow-pasture. . . . A word of common use in Lancashire. Blount, Glossographia (1670).

Vachery (the ch with its French sound) is the name of several farms in different parts of England.
Latham. (Imp. Dict.) vacillancy (vas′i-lạn-si), n. [< vacillan(t) + -cy.] A state of vacillating or wavering; vacillation; inconstancy; fluctuation. Dr. H. More, Divine Dialogues. [Rare.]

vacillant (vas′i-lant), a. [< L. vacillan(t-)s, ppr. of vacillare, vacillate: see vacillate.] Vacillating; wavering; fluctuating; unsteady. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.

vacillate (vas′i-lāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. vacillated, ppr. vacillating. [< L. vacillatus, pp. of vacillare (> It. vacillare = Pg. vacillar = Sp. vacilar = F. vaciller), sway to and fro, vacillate; a dim. or freq. form, prob. akin to Skt. √ vank, go tortuously, be crooked, vakra, bent: see wag.] 1. To waver; move one way and the other; reel; stagger.

But whilst it [a spheroid] turns upon an axis which is not permanent, . . . it is always liable to shift and vacillate from one axis to another. Paley, Nat. Theol., xxii.

2. To fluctuate in mind or opinion; waver; be irresolute or inconstant.

A self-tormentor he continued still to be, vacillating between hope and fear. Southey, Bunyan, p. 30.

He could not rest,
Nor firmly fix the vacillating mind,
That, ever working, could no centre find.
Crabbe, Works, V. 10.

=Syn. 1 and 2. Waver, Oscillate, etc. (see fluctuate), sway.—2. To hesitate.

vacillatingly (vas′i-lā-ting-li), adv. In a vacillating manner; unsteadily; fluctuatingly.

vacillation (vas-i-lā′shọn), n. [Formerly also vacilation; < OF. (and F.) vacillation = Sp. vacilación = Pg. vacillação = It. vacillazione, < L. vacillatio(n-), a reeling, wavering, < vacillare, pp. vacillatus, sway to and fro: see vacillate.] 1. The act of vacillating; a wavering; a moving one way and the other; a reeling or staggering.

They [the bones of the feet] are put in action by every slip or vacillation of the body. Paley, Nat. Theol., xi.

2. Vacillating conduct; fluctuation of resolution; inconstancy; changeableness.

No remainders of doubt, no vacillation.
Bp. Hall, Peace-Maker, ii. § 4.

By your variety and vacillation you lost the acceptable time of the first grace.
Bacon, Charge in Star Chamber against W. Talbot.

vacillatory (vas′i-lā-tō-ri), a. [< vacillate + -ory.] Inclined to vacillate; wavering; vacillating; uncertain; irresolute. [Rare.]

Such vacillatory accounts of affairs of state.
Roger North, Examen, p. 25.

vacoa (vak′ō-ä), n. [Native name.] A general name in Mauritius for the screw-pines (Pandanus), which there abound in numerous species, forming trees 20 or 30 feet high or more. P. utilis, introduced from Madagascar, growing, if permitted, 30 feet or more high, is commonly planted for its leaves, which are fabricated into sugar-sacks or vacoa bags. See cut under Pandanus.

vacua, n. An occasional plural of vacuum.

vacuate (vak′ū-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. vacuated, ppr. vacuating. [< L. vacuatus, pp. of vacuare, make empty or void, < vacuus, empty: see vacuous.] To make empty or void; evacuate. [Rare.]

Mistaken zeal, . . . like the Pharisee's Corban, under the pretense of an extraordinary service to God, vacuates all duty to man.
Secular Priest Exposed (1703), p. 27. (Latham.)

vacuation (vak-ū-ā′shọn), n. [< vacuate + -ion.] The act of emptying; evacuation.
Bailey, 1731. [Rare.]

vacuist (vak′ū-ist), n. [< vacuum + -ist.] One who holds the doctrine of the reality of empty spaces in nature: opposed to plenist.

And the vacuists will have this advantage, that if Mr. Hobbes shall say that it is as lawful for him to assume a plenum as for others to assume a vacuum, not only it may be answered it is also as lawful for them to assume the contrary, and he but barely assuming, not proving, a plenum, his doctrine will still remain questionable.
Boyle, Examen of Hobbes, ii.

★vacuity (vā-kū′i-ti), n.; pl. vacuities (-tiz). [< OF. (and F.) vacuité = Pr. vacuitat = Sp. vacuidad = Pg. vacuidade = It. vacuità, < L. vacuita(t-)s, emptiness, < vacuus, empty: see vacuous.] 1. The state of being vacuous, empty, or unfilled; emptiness; vacancy; the state of being devoid or destitute of anything.

Men . . . are at first without understanding or knowledge at all. Nevertheless from this vacuity they grow by degrees till they come at length to be even as the angels themselves are. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, i. 6.

Leave weak eyes to grow sand-blind,
Content with darkness and vacuity.
Browning, Development.

2. Space unfilled or unoccupied, or apparently unoccupied; a vacant space; also, a vacuum.

The sides of the vacuity are set with columns.
Evelyn, Diary, Jan. 18, 1645.

The world, so far as it is a negation, is a negation of infinite vacuity in time and space.
Veitch, Introd. to Descartes's Method, p. clxii.

But yesterday I saw a dreary vacuity in this direction in which now I see so much.
Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 278.

3. Want of reality; inanity; nihility.

If they'll run behind the glass to catch at it, their expectations will meet with vacuity and emptiness. Glanville.

4. Freedom from mental exertion; thoughtlessness; listlessness; idleness.

A patient people, much given to slumber and vacuity, and but little troubled with the disease of thinking.
Irving, Knickerbocker, ii. 1.

5. Lack of intelligence; stupidity.

He was confounded, and continued looking with that perplexed vacuity of eye which puzzled souls generally stare with. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, iii. 1.

Vacuna (vā-kū′nä), n. [< L. vacuna, < vacare, be at leisure: see vacant, vacate.] In Latin myth., the goddess of rural leisure, to whom husbandmen sacrificed at the close of harvest. She was especially a deity of the Sabines.

vacuolar (vak′ū-ō-lär), a. [< vacuole + -ar[3].] Of the nature of or pertaining to a vacuole; resembling a vacuole: as, vacuolar spaces. See cut under hydranth. Amer. Nat., October, 1890, p. 895.

vacuolate (vak′ū-ō-lāt), a. [< vacuole + -ate[1].] Same as vacuolated. Micros. Sci., XXX. 6.

vacuolated (vak′ū-ō-lā-ted), a. [< vacuolate + -ed.] Provided with vacuoles; minutely vesicular, as a protozoan.

vacuolation (vak″ū-ō-lā′shọn), n. [< vacuolate + -ion.] The formation of vacuoles; the state of being vacuolated; a system of vacuoles.
★Encyc. Brit., XIX. 848.

vacuole (vak′ū-ōl), n. [< F. vacuole, < NL. vacuolum*, dim. of L. vacuum, an empty space, vacuum: see vacuum.] 1. A minute cell or cavity in the tissue of organisms.—2. In anat., a minute space, vacuity, or interstice of tissue in which lymphatic vessels are supposed to originate.—3. In zoöl., any minute vesicle or vacuity in the tissue of a protozoan, as an amœba. Vacuoles are sometimes divided into permanent, contractile or pulsating, and gastric. The first are sometimes so numerous as to give the organism a vesicular or bubble-like appearance. The second kind exhibit regular contraction and dilatation, or pulsate. Gastric vacuoles, or food-vacuoles, occur in connection with the ingestion and digestion of food; these are formed by a globule of water which has been taken in with a particle of food, and are not permanent. See cuts under Actinosphærium, Noctiluca, Paramecium, sun-animalcule, and Cestoidea.

4. In bot., a cavity of greater or less size within the protoplasmic mass of active vegetable cells, which is filled with water, or cell-sap as it is called. Active protoplasm possesses the power of imbibing water into its substance and, as a consequence, of increasing in size. When the amount of water is so great that the protoplasm may be said to be more than saturated with it, the excess is separated within the protoplasmic mass in the form of rounded drops called vacuoles. In closed cells these may become so large and abundant as to be separated only by thin plates of protoplasm. As such vacuoles become larger the plates are broken through, and eventually there may be but one large vacuole surrounded by a thin layer of protoplasm, which lines the interior of the cell-wall. Bessey.

vacuolization (vak-ū-ol-i-zā′shọn), n. [< vacuole + -ize + -ation.] In histology, same as vacuolation. Amer. Jour. Psychol., II. 634.

vacuolize (vak′ū-ō-līz), v. t.; pret and pp. vacuolized, ppr. vacuolizing. To supply or furnish with vacuoles. Thausing, Beer (trans.), p. 533. [Rare.]

vacuous (vak′ū-us), a. [= It. vacuo (cf. Sp. vacío = Pg. vazio, < L. vacivus), < L. vacuus, empty.] 1. Empty; unfilled; void; vacant.

Boundless the deep, because I Am, who fill Infinitude; nor vacuous the space.
Milton, P. L., vii. 169.

These pulpits were filled, or rather made vacuous, by men whose privileged education in the ancient centres of instruction issued in twenty minutes' formal reading of tepid exhortation or probably infirm deductions from premises based on rotten scaffolding.
George Eliot, Felix Holt, xv.

2. Without intelligence or intelligent expression; unexpressive; showing no intelligence: as, a vacuous look.

Up the marble stairs came the most noble Farintosh, with that vacuous leer which distinguishes his lordship.
Thackeray, Newcomes, xli.

vacuousness (vak′ū-us-nes), n. The state of being vacuous, in either sense; vacuity.

★vacuum (vak′ū-um), n.; pl. vacuums (-umz), sometimes vacua (-ä). [= F. vacuum = Sp. Pg. It. vacuo, < L. vacuum, an empty space, a void, neut. of vacuus, empty: see vacuous.] Empty space; space void of matter: opposed to plenum; in practical use, an inclosed space from which the air (or other gas) has been very nearly removed, as by an air-pump. The metaphysicians of Elea, Parmenides and Melissus, started the notion that a vacuum was impossible, and this became a favorite doctrine with Aristotle. All the scholastics upheld the maxim that "nature abhors a vacuum." This is the doctrine of the plenists. Atomism, on the other hand, carried out in a thoroughgoing manner, supposes empty space between the atoms. That gases do not fill space homogeneously is now demonstrated by the phenomena of transfusion and by the impulsion of Crookes's radiometer; while the other observed facts about gases, taken in connection with these, render some form of the kinetical theory of gases almost certain. This supposes the molecules of gases to be at great distances from one another as compared with their spheres of sensible action. This, however, does not exclude, but rather favors, Boscovich's theory of atoms—namely, that atoms are mere movable centers of potential energy endowed with inertia; and this theory makes each atom extend throughout all space in a certain sense. But this does not constitute a plenum, for a plenum is the exclusive occupation of each part of space by a portion of matter. It may be said that the spaces between the atoms are filled by the luminiferous ether; but the dispersion of light by refraction seems to show that the ether itself has a molecular structure. A vacuum, in the sense of a space devoid of ordinary ponderable matter, is produced (more or less perfectly) when the air is removed from an inclosed space, such as the receiver of an air-pump, a part of a barometric tube, etc. In the receiver of the ordinary air-pump the vacuum can only be partial, since with each stroke of the piston only a certain fraction of the air is removed (depending upon the relative size of the cylinder and the receiver), and hence, theoretically, an infinite number of strokes would be necessary. Practically, the degree of exhaustion obtained falls short of that demanded by theory, owing to the imperfections of the machine; thus, in the common form, the exhaustion is limited to the point where the remaining air has not sufficient elasticity to raise the valves. By the mercury air-pump or by mechanical pumps in which oil is used a higher degree of exhaustion is attainable than with the older forms. (See mercury air-pump, under mercury.) The most perfect vacuum is obtained when chemical means are employed to absorb the last traces of gas left in the receiver exhausted by the mercury air-pump. The Torricellian vacuum—that is, the space above the mercury in a carefully manipulated barometer-tube—is nearly perfect in this respect, but the space contains a small amount of the vapor of mercury. See Torricellian.

Vacuum . . . signifies space without body.
Locke, Human Understanding, II. xiii. 22.

A vacuum, or space in which there is absolutely no body, is repugnant to reason.
Descartes, Prin. of Philos. (tr. by Veitch), ii. § 16.

Guerickian vacuum. See Guerickian.

vacuum-brake (vak′ū-um-brāk), n. A form of continuous brake formerly used on railroads, employing a steam-jet directly, and the pressure of the atmosphere indirectly, as a means of controlling the pressure on the brake-shoes. A steam-jet on the engine is allowed to escape through an ejector, in such a way as to create a partial vacuum in a continuous pipe extending under all the cars of a train. Collapsing bellows under each car are connected with the pipes, and, when exhausted of the air contained in them, close and draw the brake-rods. See continuous brake, under brake[3].

Vacuum-gage.

vacuum-filter (vak′ū-um-fil″tėr), n. A form of filter in which the air beneath the filtering material is exhausted to hasten the process.

vacuum-gage (vak′ū-um-gāj), n. A form of pressure-gage for indicating the internal pressure or the amount of vacuum in a steam-condenser, a boiler in which the steam has condensed, the receiver of an air-pump, etc. An old form consists of an inverted graduated siphon of glass, open at one end, and connected at the other with the condenser or vessel to be tested, and containing a quantity of mercury. When not in use, the mercury rises equally in both legs of the siphon; on connecting the instrument with a vacuum, the mercury rises in the leg next the condenser or other vessel, and sinks in the other leg, the difference between them indicating the amount of the vacuum. The common modern form closely resembles the aneroid barometer in principle.

vacuum-pan (vak′ū-um-pan), n. In the processes of sugar-making, condensed-milk manufacture, etc., a large steam-jacketed vessel of copper or iron, used in boiling and concentrating syrup, milk, etc. Two forms are used, one consisting of two parts bolted together to form a spheroidal vessel, and the other of a drum shape with a domed top. The syrup or milk is placed in the pan, the vessel is closed air-tight, and connections are made by means of pipes with a condenser and air-pump. Steam is admitted to the jacket round the lower part of the pan, and to coils of pipes within it. The air-pump serves to draw off the vapor from the boiling contents, and to create a vacuum within the pan. The advantages of thus boiling in a vacuum are found in the lower temperature at which boiling takes place, and, as a result, in the greater rapidity of the process and purity of the product. Vacuum-pans are sometimes placed in pairs, the steam from one pan serving to heat the fluid in the second pan. Such an arrangement is called a double-effect system. Occasionally three pans are used together, one large pan supplying steam for two smaller pans. This is called a triple-effect system. See sugar.

Vacuum-pan.

a, copper pan; b, iron steam-jacket; c, copper steam-coil; d, flanged dome; e, measuring vessel used in charging the pan; e′, pipe which connects e with the juice-vat; f, pipe which connects e with the pan; f′, cock which admits air into e; h, h, gages which indicate height of liquid in e and s; i, mercurial vacuum-gage; k, man-hole by which pan may be entered; l, thermometer, showing interior temperature of the pan; j, proof-stick for sampling the contents of the pan; m, valve for admitting steam to the coil; n, valve for admitting steam to interior of pan for cleaning; o, window (of which there are two) by which interior of pan may be inspected; p, saucer-shaped valve, closing or opening the outlet q according as it is operated by the lever r; s, overflow vessel, to retain any fluid that may boil over.

vacuum-pump (vak′ū-um-pump), n. A pump consisting of a chamber or barrel, a suction-pipe with a valve to prevent return flow, a discharge-pipe which has a valve that is closed when the chamber is emptied, and a steam induction-pipe provided with a valve that is opened when the chamber is filled with water, and closed when the chamber is filled with steam. The chamber is placed at such a height above the water to be raised that the exterior atmospheric pressure will cause the water to rise through the suction-pipe, and fill the partial vacuum caused by condensation of steam in the chamber. Steam being admitted to the chamber forces out the air or water. The induction-valve is then closed. The loss of heat from the surface of the cylinder, or the sudden injection of a water-spray, condenses the steam. Water then rises, and fills the chamber. Steam is then again admitted, forcing out the water through the discharge-pipe. As soon as the water is discharged and the chamber refilled with steam, the cycle of operations recommences, and it is repeated continuously as long as steam is supplied to the chamber. The opening and closing of the valves have been made automatic in this class of pumps, but they are so wasteful of power that they are very little used. See cuts under monte-jus and pulsometer. Also called steam vacuum-pump.

vacuum-tube (vak′ū-um-tūb), n. A sealed glass tube employed to examine the effects of a discharge of electricity through air or other gas rarefied or exhausted to the required degree.

Vacuum-tube.

The most striking phenomenon is the magnificent colored light with which the tube is filled and the stratification of the light about the tube, the color of the light being different at the positive and negative electrodes, and varying with the gas through which the discharge is passed. Thus, in common air it is purple or red at the positive end, blue or violet at the negative; in hydrogen, it is greenish-blue; in carbonic oxid, bright-green, turning to yellow at the positive, and to blue at the negative. These tubes were first made by Geissler of Bonn, and hence have been called Geissler's tubes. A Crookes's tube is a form of vacuum-tube used by Sir William Crookes in his investigation of what he has called radiant matter (which see, under radiant). The exhaustion of these tubes is carried to about one millionth of an atmosphere.

vacuum-valve (vak′ū-um-valv), n. A safety-valve which opens inward, so connected with a boiler or other vessel that when there is a vacuum it will be forced open by atmospheric pressure. Also called air-valve.

vade† (vād), v. i. [A form of fade[1] (after MD. vadden, fade, or L. vadere, go?).] 1. To become pale or weak, as a color; hence, to pass away; vanish; depart.

Color evanidus, fugax. . . . A vading: a decaying, or a dead colour.
Nomenclator (1585). (Nares.)

Life doth vade, and young men must be old.
Greene, Palmer's Verses.

2. To fade; wither.

Mine is the heart which vades away as doth the flower or grass. Peele, Sir Clyomon and Sir Clamydes.

Fair flower, untimely plucked, soon vaded.
Shak., Passionate Pilgrim, l. 131.

vade-mecum (vā′dē-mē′kum), n. [= F. Sp. vade-mecum, < NL. vade-mecum, < L. vade mecum, 'go with me,' < vade, impv. of vadere (= E. wade), go, + me, abl. of ego, I, + cum, with.] A book or other thing that a person carries with him as a constant companion; a pocket-companion; a manual; a handbook.

One boracho or leathern bottle of Tours . . . Panurge filled for himself, for he called that his vademecum.
Urquhart, tr. of Rabelais, ii. 28.

vadimony† (vad′i-mō-ni), n. [< L. vadimonium, security, recognizance, < vas (vad-), bail, surety: see wed, wage.] In old law, a bond or pledge to appear before a judge on a fixed day; bail.

vadium (vā′di-um), n. [NL., < L. vas (vad-), bail, surety: see wed, wage.] In Scots law, a wad; a pledge or surety.—Vadium mortuum, a mortgage.—Vadium vivum, a living pledge.

Væjovis, n. See Vejovis.

vafrity†, n. Craft. Bailey.

vafrous (vā′frus), a. [< L. vafer (vafr-), cunning, subtle, + -ous.] Crafty; cunning.

He that deals with a Fox may be held very simple if he expect not his vafrous tricks. Feltham, Resolves, ii. 42.

vag (vag), n. Turf for fuel. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

He may turn many an honest penny by the sale of vags, i. e. dried peat. The Portfolio, No. 229, p. 11.

vagabond (vag′a-bond), a. and n. [Early mod. E. also vagabunde, vacabonde, vacabund, < ME. vagabunde, < OF. vagabond, vacabond, F. vagabond = Pr. vagabon = Sp. Pg. vagabundo = It. vagabondo, vagabundo = G. vagabund = D. vagebond = Sw. Dan. vagabond, < LL. vagabundus, wandering, strolling about, < L. vagari, wander, < vagus, wandering: see vague. Cf. vagrant.] I. a. 1. Wandering; moving from place to place without any settled habitation; nomadic.

Owre men suppose them to bee a vagabunde and wanderinge nacion lyke vnto the Scythians, withowte houses or certeyne dwellinge places.
Peter Martyr (tr. in Eden's First Books on America, ed. [Arber, p. 97).

Let them pronounce the steep Tarpeian death,
Vagabond exile, . . . I would not buy Their mercy at the price of one fair word.
Shak., Cor., iii. 3. 89.

2. Floating about without any certain direction; driven to and fro.

Like to a vagabond flag upon the stream.
Shak., A. and C., i. 4. 45.

3. Of or pertaining to a vagabond or worthless stroller; vagrant.—4. Not sedentary, as a spider; belonging to the Vagabundæ.

II. n. 1. One who is without a settled home; one who goes from place to place; a wanderer; a vagrant: not necessarily in a bad sense.

Reduc'd, like Hannibal, to seek relief
From court to court, and wander up and down,
A vagabond in Afric. Addison, Cato, ii. 4.

He who goes from country to country, guided by the blind impulse of curiosity, is only a vagabond.
Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, vii.

2. An idle, worthless stroller from place to place without fixed habitation or visible means of earning an honest livelihood; in law, an idle, worthless vagrant. See vagrant.

Wee haue had amongst vs Vagabonds, which call themselues Egyptians, the dregs of mankinde.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 590.

3. An idle, worthless fellow; a scamp; a rascal. [Colloq.]—4. One of the Vagabundæ.—5. A pyralid moth, Crambus vulgivagellus. See cut under Crambidæ.—Rogues and vagabonds. See rogue.

vagabond (vag′a-bond), v. i. [< vagabond, n.] To wander about in an idle manner; play the vagabond: sometimes with an indefinite it.

Vagabonding in those untrodden places, they were guided by the everlasting justice, using themselves to be punishers of their faults. Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, iv.

vagabondage (vag′a-bon-dāj), n. [< vagabond + -age.] The state, condition, or habits of a vagabond; idle wandering, with or without fraudulent intent: as, to live in vagabondage.

It reëstablished the severest penalties on vagabondage, even to death without benefit of clergy.
H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 103.

vagabondise, v. i. See vagabondize.

vagabondish (vag′a-bon-dish), a. [< vagabond + -ish[1].] Like a vagabond; wandering.

vagabondism (vag′a-bon-dizm), n. [< vagabond + -ism.] The ways or habits of a vagabond; vagabondage.

As encouraging vagabondism and barbarism.
The Century, XXX. 813.

vagabondize (vag′a-bon-dīz), v. i.; pret. and pp. vagabondized, ppr. vagabondizing. [< vagabond + -ize.] To wander like a vagabond; play the vagabond: sometimes with an indefinite it. Also spelled vagabondise.

Vagabondizing it all over Holland.
C. Reade, Cloister and Hearth, liii. (Davies.)

vagabondry† (vag′a-bon-dri), n. [Early mod. E. vagabundrye; < vagabond + -ry.] Vagabondage.

Idlenes and Vagabundrye is the mother and roote of all theftes, robberyes, and all evill actes and other mischiefs.
Laws of Edw. VI. (1547), quoted in Ribton-Turner's [Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 89.

vagabone, n. and v. A corruption of vagabond.

Vagabundæ (vag-a-bun′dē), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. of L. vagabundus, wandering: see vagabond.] A division of true spiders, consisting of those dipneumonous forms which are not sedentary. They spin no web, and do not lie in wait for their prey, but prowl in search of it.

vagal (vā′gal), a. [< vag(us) + -al.] Of or pertaining to the vagus, or par vagum; pneumogastric. See vagus.

vagancy† (vā′gan-si), n. [< vagan(t) + -cy.] 1. Vagrancy; wandering.

Springlove. Here are the Keys of all my Charge, Sir.
My humble suit is that you will be pleas'd
To let me walk upon my known occasions this Sommer.
Lawyer. Fie! Canst not yet leave off those Vagancies?
Brome, Jovial Crew, v.

2. Extravagance.

Our happiness may orbe itselfe into a thousand vagancies of glory and delight. Milton, Church-Government, i. 1.

vagans (vā′ganz), n. In music, same as quintus.

vagant† (vā′gant), a. [< ME. vagaunt, < OF. (and F.) vagant = Sp. Pg. It. vagante, < L. vagan(t-)s, wandering, ppr. of vagari, wander, < vagus, wandering, vague: see vague, v. Hence vagrant.] Wandering; vagrant.

Fro thi face I shal be hid, and I shal be vagaunt.
Wyclif, Gen. iv. 14.

vagarian (vā-gā′ri-an), n. [< vagary + -an.] One given to vagaries; a "crank." [Colloq. or rare.]

vagarious (vā-gā′ri-us), a. [< vagary + -ous.] Having vagaries; whimsical; capricious; irregular. De Morgan, Budget of Paradoxes, p. 153.

vagarish (vā-gā′rish), a. [< vagar-y + -ish[1].] Wandering; given to vagaries.

His eyes were oft vagarish.
Wolcot (Peter Pindar), p. 305. (Davies.)

vagarity (vā-gar′i-ti), n. [< vagar-y + -ity.] The character or state of being vagarious; capriciousness; irregularity.

Instances of vagarity are noticeable with each Prince of Wales, many of whom seem to have ignored, or rather not enjoyed, the title [Duke of Cornwall], although probably they did the revenues. N. and Q., 7th ser., II. 89.

vagary† (vā-gā′ri), v. i. [Early mod. E. vagarie; appar. < L. vagari (> It. vagare = Sp. vagar = Pg. vaguear = F. vaguer), wander, < vagus, wandering: see vague, a., and vague, v. Cf. vagary, n. The L. (or perhaps the It.) inf. appears to have been adopted as a whole, and accommodated to E. nouns in -ary; but this can hardly be explained except as an orig. university use. There is no L. or ML. adj. vagarius* or noun vagaria*.] To gad; range.

Vaguer, to wander, vagarie, stray, gad, roame, raunge, flit, remoue often from place to place. Cotgrave.

vagary (vā-gā′ri), n.; pl. vagaries (-riz). [Early mod. E. also vagarie, vagare, corruptly fagary, figary; appar. < vagary, v.] 1†. A wandering or strolling.

The people called Phœnices gave themselves to long vagaries, and continual viages by sea.
Barnaby Rich, tr. of Herodotus.

I laid the weight
Of mine Estate in Stewardship upon thee;
Which kept thee in that year, after so many Sommer vagaries thou hadst made before.
Brome, Jovial Crew, i.

2. A wandering of the thoughts; a wild freak; a whim; a whimsical purpose.

She 's gone; and now, sir Hugh, let me tell you you have not dealt well with me, to put this fagary into her foolish fancy. Brome, Sparagus Garden, ii. 2.

They changed their minds,
Flew off, and into strange vagaries fell.
Milton, P. L., vi. 614.

vagas, n. Same as vakass.

vagation† (vā-gā′shon), n. [< L. vagatio(n-), a wandering, < vagari, pp. vagatus, wander: see vagant.] A wandering; a roving about.

Whene the mynde es stablede sadely with-owttene changynge and vagacyone in Godd.
Hampole, Prose Treatises (E. E. T. S.), p. 14.

Vagatores (vag-a-tō′rēz), n. pl. [NL., < L. vagari, pp. vagatus, wander: see vagant.] In ornith., a group of birds, constituting the fourth order in Macgillivray's classification, and consisting of the crows and their allies. The word has no standing in science, as it designates an artificial group recognized by no other authors of note.

vagi, n. Plural of vagus.

vagient† (vā′ji-ent), a. [< L. vagien(t-)s, ppr. of vagire, cry, squall, bleat.] Crying like a child. Dr. H. More, Psychathanasia, III. iv. 42.

vagina (vā-jī′nā), n.; pl. vaginæ (-nē). [= F. vagin, < NL. vagina, < L. vagina, a sheath, covering, sheath of a scabbard, ear of grain, etc., hull, husk, vagina.] 1. In bot., the sheath formed by the basal part of certain leaves where they embrace the stem; a sheath.—2. In anat. and zoöl., a sheath; a sheathing or covering part or organ; a case: specifically applied to various structures. (a) The sexual passage of the female from the vulva to the uterus. In all the higher Mammalia it is the terminal section of a Müllerian duct or oviduct united with its fellow; in the lower it is double, wholly or in part, there being two more or less complete vaginæ, right and left. In some oviparous animals, as birds, the termination of the oviduct, beyond the uterine part, receives the name of vagina. See uterus, and cut under peritoneum. (b) In entom., a sheath-like plate or part inclosing an organ. In some cases also called valve. Specifically—(1) The long channeled labrum of the mosquito and other blood-sucking flies, in which the lancet-like mandibles and maxillæ are concealed. (2) The jointed sheath of the promuscis of hemipterous insects, homologous with the labium of a typical insect. (3) The parts supporting and covering the tongue of a bee, corresponding to the mentum, maxillæ, and palpi. (4) The tubular sheath of the sting of a bee or wasp. (c) In Protozoa, the indurated lorica of some infusorians, as the vaginicolous vorticellids. (d) In Vermes, a terminal section of the oviduct, differentiated into a special canal. See cuts under Rhabdocœla, Trematoda, and Cestoidea.

3. In arch., the upper part of the pedestal of a terminus, from which the bust or figure seems to issue or arise; a sheath or gaine. [Rare or obsolete.] —Columns of the vagina. Same as columnæ rugarum (which see, under columna). —Rugæ of the vagina. See ruga. —Tensor laminæ posterioris vaginæ recti abdominis. See tensor. —Tensor vaginæ femoris. See tensor. —Vagina cellulosa. Same as epineurium and perimysium. —Vagina femoris, the fascia lata of the thigh. See fascia and tensor. —Vagina masculina, the prostatic vesicle of the male urethra. See urethra. 4. In med., wandering: as, vagrant cells (wandering white corpuscles of the blood).

II. n. 1. A wanderer; a rover; a rambler.

> Historie without Geographie moueth, but in mouing wandreth as a vagrant, without certain habitation. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 50.
>
> A vagrant and a servant in vile employment, in a strange countrey. Barrow, Sermons, xlvii.

2. An idle stroller; a vagabond; a loafer; a tramp: now the ordinary meaning.

> Vagrants and Out-laws shall offend thy View;
> For such must be my Friends.
> Prior, Henry and Emma.

> The fugitive, with the brand of Cain on him, was a vagrant of necessity, hunted to death like a wolf.
> Ribton-Turner, Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 5.

In law the word vagrant has a much more extended meaning than that assigned to it in ordinary language, and in its application the notion of wandering is almost lost, the object of the statutes being to subject to police control various ill-defined classes of persons whose habits of life are inconsistent with the good order of society. In the English statutes vagrants are divided into three grades: (a) idle and disorderly persons, or such as, while able to maintain themselves and families, neglect to do so, unlicensed peddlers or chapmen, beggars, common prostitutes, etc.; (b) rogues and vagabonds, notoriously idle and disorderly persons, fortune-tellers and other like impostors, public gamblers and sharpers, persons having no visible means of living and unable to give a good account of themselves, etc.; (c) incorrigible rogues—that is, such as have been repeatedly convicted as rogues and vagabonds, jail-breakers, and persons escaping from legal durance, etc. In the United States the statutes are diverse, but in their general features include to a greater or less extent beggars, drunken parents who refuse or fail to support their children, paupers when dissolute and sick, prostitutes, public masqueraders, tramps, truants, etc.

vagrantly (vā′grant-li), adv. [< vagrant + -ly[2].] In a vagrant, wandering, or unsettled manner.

vagrantness (vā′grant-nes), n. The state of being vagrant; vagrancy. [Rare.]

vagrom† (vā′grom), a. A perverted spelling and pronunciation of vagrant, ascribed as a blunder to Dogberry in "Much Ado about Nothing," and with allusion to this occasionally used by modern writers.

> This is your charge: you shall comprehend all vagrom men; you are to bid any man stand, in the prince's name.
> Shak., Much Ado, iii. 3. 26.
>
> You took my vagrom essays in;
> You found them shelter over sea.
> New Princeton Rev., VI. 114.

vague (vāg), a. and n. [< F. vague = Sp. Pg. It. vago, < L. vagus, wandering, rambling, strolling, fig. uncertain, vague. From the same L. source are E. vague, v., vagabond, vagant, vagrant, vagary, extravagant, extravagate, stravagant, stravaig, etc., also Sc. vaig.] I. a. 1†. Wandering; roving; vagrant.

> Gray encouraged his men to set upon the vague villains, good neither to live peaceably nor to fight.
> Sir J. Hayward.

2. Uncertain as to characters and specific designation, yet limited in scope and application; restricted in logical breadth, without any corresponding fullness of logical depth; said to be determinate, but without precise expression of the determination. Thus, if anything is described as most extraordinary without saying in what respect, the description is vague; if a word is understood to have a full import but what that is is doubtful, it is vague; if an emotion is strong but unaccompanied by a definite imagination of its object, it is vague; if a pictorial figure represents that something exists but fails to show its shape, situation, etc., it is vague. This meaning of the word (which occurs seldom before the eighteenth century without an explanatory accompaniment) seems to be derived from the logical phrase individuum vagum, meaning a single person or thing, designated as one in number, but without its proper name or any adequate description: as, "a certain man."

> A vague apprehension of I knew not what occupied my mind. Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 193.
>
> "Conscience!" said the Chancellor; "conscience is a vague word, which signifies any thing or nothing."
> Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

3. Proceeding from no known authority; of uncertain origin or derivation: as, a vague report.

> I have read, in some old, marvellous tale,
> Some legend strange and vague,
> That a midnight host of spectres pale > Beleaguered the walls of Prague.
> Longfellow, The Beleaguered City.

4. Having unclear perception or thought; not thinking clearly.

> Random cares and truant joys,
> That shield from mischief and preserve from stains
> Vague minds, while men are growing out of boys.
> Wordsworth, River Duddon, xxvi.

Vague individual, sense, term. See the nouns. = Syn. 2. Dim, obscure, indistinct, ambiguous.

II. n. 1. A wandering; a journey; a voyage. Halliwell. —2†. A vagary; a whim.

> Here this fylthy synke of rebels, thus conspired, played their vages, and lyued with loose brydels in al kyndes of myschefe. Peter Martyr (tr. in Eden's First Books on [America, ed. Arber, p. 86).

3. An undefined expanse; indefinite space.

> The star-sown vague of space. Lowell, After the Burial.

vague† (vāg), v. i. [Sc. also vaig; < F. vaguer, wander, = Sp. Pg. vagar, vaguear = It. vagare, < L. vagari, wander, < vagus, wandering: see vague, a. Cf. vagary, v.] To wander; rove; roam; play the vagrant.

The strange and idill beggaris . . . are sufferit to vaig and wander throughout the haill cuntrey.
Scotch Laws, 1600, quoted in Ribton-Turner's Vagrants [and Vagrancy, p. 350.

These small bodies, being hudled perforce one upon another, leave a large void space, to vague and range abroad.
Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 630.

vaguely (vāg'li), adv. In a vague, uncertain, or unsettled manner; without definiteness or distinctness.

vagueness (vāg'nes), n. The state of being vague, indefinite, unsettled, or uncertain; ambiguousness; indistinctness.

Common language has, in most cases, a certain degree of looseness and ambiguity; as common knowledge has usually something of vagueness and indistinctness.
Whewell, Philos. of Inductive Sciences, I. xlviii.

There is a degree of vagueness about the use of the terms person and personality.
H. B. Smith, Christian Theology, p. 170.

vagus (vā'gus), n.; pl. vagi (-jī). [NL. (sc. nervus, nerve), < L. vagus, wandering: see vague.] 1. The tenth cranial nerve, or wandering nerve, the longest and most widely distributed of the nerves of the brain, extending through the neck and thorax to the upper part of the abdomen. It supplies the organs of voice and respiration with motor and sensory fibers, and the pharynx, esophagus, stomach, and heart with motor influence. Its superficial origin is from the medulla, immediately in front of the restiform body and below that of the glossopharyngeal. It passes out of the cranial cavity through the jugular foramen, and accompanies the carotid artery in the neck to the thorax, where the nerves of the two sides differ in their course, that of the right side reaching the posterior surface of the esophagus and stomach, while that of the left goes to the anterior. It gives off very numerous branches, as the meningeal, auricular, pharyngeal, laryngeal, pulmonary, cardiac, gastric, etc., and forms intricate connections with other nerves of the cerebrospinal system, and with nerves of the sympathetic system. Also called pneumogastric, par vagum, and formerly second division of the eighth nerve of Willis.

The vagus nerve, which connects the brain with the viscera.
H. Spencer, Education, p. 273.

2. In insects, the principal visceral or stomatogastric nerve, which originates in two parts in the head, beneath the bases of the antennæ, uniting in a ganglion below the cerebrum, and passing backward along the upper surface of the intestinal canal. In the thorax it divides into two parts, which give off numerous smaller nerves to all the viscera.—Trigonum vagi. Same as ala cinerea (which see, under ala).—Vagus ganglion. See ganglion.

Vahea (vä'hē-ä), n. [NL. (Lamarck, 1792), from the name of the tree in Madagascar.] A proposed genus of apocynaceous plants, comprising a few (perhaps two) species included by recent authors in the genus Pacouria. The name Vahea was formerly used by some in place of Pacouria for several other species which are important rubber-plants, as P. Heudelotii (Vahea Heudelotii of Mueller) of Senegal, P. florida of West Africa, remarkable for the beauty of its abundant fragrant white flowers, and P. Owariensis (Vahea Owariensis of Mueller) of Angola, which bears an edible, sweet and acidulous pulpy fruit of the size of an orange.

vaich, v. i. See vake.

Vaidic, Vaidik (vā'dik), a. [< Skt. vāidika, relating to the Vedas.] Same as Vedic. J. T. Wheeler, Short Hist. India, p. 61.

Where the Seven Spears of Wedderburne
Their men in battle-order set.
Scott, L. of L. M., v. 4.

vail[2] (vāl), n. [By aphæresis from avail[1], n.] 1†. Profit; gain; produce.

My house is as 'twere the cave where the young outlaw hoards the stolen vails of his occupation.
Marston, Jonson, and Chapman, Eastward Ho, ii. 1.

His commings in are like a Taylors, from the shreds of bread, the chippings, and remnants of the broken crust: excepting his vailes from the barrell, which poore folkes buy for their hogs, but drinke themselues.
Bp. Earle, Micro-cosmographie, An old Colledge Butler.

2†. An unlooked-for or casual acquisition; a windfall. Tooke.—3. Money given to servants by a visitor; a tip: usually in the plural. Also vale.

Why should he, like a Servant, seek Vails over and above his Wages?
Milton, Touching Hirelings.

"Avails" is good old English, and the vails of Sir Joshua Reynolds's porter are famous.
Lowell, Biglow Papers, 2d ser., Int.

On the smallest provocation, or at the hope of the smallest increase of wages, or still more of vales, the servant threw up his place.
Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., iv.

vail[3]† (vāl), v. [Also vale; by aphæresis from obs. avale: see avale.] I. trans. To let or cast down; let fall; lower; doff, especially in token of submission.

Then may'st thou think that Mars himself came down,
To vail thy plumes, and heave thee from thy pomp.

Vaine-glorious man, when fluttering Wind does blow,
In his light winges is lifted up to skye.
Spenser, F. Q., II. iii. 10.

The philosophers of his time, the flustring vain-glorious Greeks, who pretended so much to magnify and even adore the wisdom they professed.
South, Sermons, III. vi.

2. Indicating or proceeding from vainglory; founded on excessive vanity; boastful.

Arrogant and vainglorious expression.
Sir M. Hale.

A vainglorious confidence prevailed, about this time, among the Spanish cavaliers.
Irving, Granada, p. 66.

He discourses, in rather a vainglorious way, of himself as a poet.
Ticknor, Span. Lit., I. 249.

vaingloriously (vān-glō'ri-us-li), adv. With vainglory or inflated arrogance; boastfully.

vaingloriousness (vān-glō'ri-us-nes), n. The quality or state of being vainglorious.

vainglory (vān-glō'ri), n. [< ME. vaine glorie, veinglorie, < OF. vaine gloire, F. vaine gloire, < L. vana gloria, empty boasting: see vain and glory.] Extravagant pride or boastfulness; tendency to exalt one's self or one's own performances unduly; inflated and pretentious vanity; vain pomp or show.

Vaine-glorie is for to have pompe and delit in his temporal highnesse, and glorie him in his worldly estate.
Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

But for the fear of incurring the suspicion of vainglory, he would have sung a psalm with as firm and cheerful a voice as if he had been worshipping God in the congregation.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

vainglory (vān-glō'ri), v. i.; pret. and pp. vainglored, ppr. vainglorying. [< vainglory, n.] To indulge in vain boasting. [Rare.]

It would be idle and frivolous to mention these points for the sake of vain-glorying during the Jubilee year.
Westminster Rev., CXXVIII. 485.

vainly (vān'li), adv. In a vain manner. Especially—(a) Without effect; to no purpose; ineffectually; in vain.

In weak complaints you vainly waste your breath.
Dryden.

Which vainly I supposed the Holy Land.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 5. 239.

We haue sufficient to content our selues, though not in such abundance as is vainly reported in England.
Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, II. 36.

vainness (vān'nes), n. 1. The state of being vain; ineffectualness; fruitlessness: as, the vainness of effort.—2. Empty pride; vanity.

Vainness, a meagre friend to gratefulness, brought him . . . to despise Erona.
Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, ii.

Free from vainness and self-glorious pride.
Shak., Hen. V., v., Prol.

3†. Foolishness; folly.

O! how great vainnesse is it then to scorne
The weake!
Spenser, Visions of the World's Vanity, l. 83.

I hate ingratitude more in a man
Than lying, vainness, babbling, drunkenness.
Shak., T. N., iii. 4. 389.

vair (vãr), n. [Formerly also were; < ME. vair, vayre, veir, feir, < OF. vair, F. vair = Pr. vair, var, vaire, fur of the ermine, < ML. varius, also varis, the ermine, < L. varius, spotted, variegated: see various. Hence vairy, and the second element of miniver.] 1. A kind of fur in use in the middle ages. It is generally assumed to have been the skin of a small animal, such as the gray squirrel, of which the back is gray and the belly white. Compare miniver.

And sythene to bedd he es broghte als it ware a prynce, and happed with ryche robes appone hyme ynewe, wele furrede with vayre and the gryse.
MS. Lincoln A. i. 17, f. 248. (Halliwell.)

Tho I was strong ant wis,
Ant werede feir and grys.
Rel. Antiq. (ed. Wright and Halliwell, 1841), I. 121.

Pall and vair no more I wear,
Nor thou the crimson sheen.
Scott, L. of the L., iv. 12.

2. In her., one of the furs. See tincture, 2. It is represented as in the illustration, except that the number of rows is not positively fixed. Compare vairé.

Vair.

vairé (vā-rā′), a. [Heraldic F., < vair, vair: see vair.] In her., composed of divisions like those of vair, but of other tinctures than of azure and argent: as, vairé or and gules. According to some writers, there must be more than two tinctures — for instance, four. The tinctures must be mentioned in the blazon: as, vairé sable, argent, gules, and or. Also vairy, verré, verry, verrey.

vaire (vār), a. Same as vairé.

vairy (vār′i), a. Same as vairé.

vaisellet†, n. An old spelling of vessel. Pitscottie.

Vaishnava (vīsh′nạ-vä̤), n. [Skt. Vaishnava, < Vishnu, Vishnu: see Vishnu.] Literally, a worshiper of Vishnu. The Vaishnavas form one of the great divisions into which the adherents of Brahmanism are divided, characterized by belief in the supremacy of Vishnu over other gods. This division is again broken up into many subordinate sects.

Vaisya (vīs′yä̤), n. [< Skt. vaiçya, < viç, settler, clansman.] A member of the third caste among the Hindus—that is to say of the main body of the Aryan people, as distinguished on the one hand from the priestly and noble classes, the Brahmans and Kshatriyas, and on the other hand from the subjugated aborigines, the Sudras and others, and from degraded outcasts. In modern times they are divided into many sub-castes.

vaivode, vaivodeship, n. See voivode, etc.

vakass, n. [Armenian.] In the Armenian Church, a eucharistic vestment, semicircular in shape and usually of metal, having a breastplate attached to it, on which are the names, heads, or figures of the twelve apostles. It is put on after the miter, sticharion, stole (urar), girdle, and epimanikia, and before the chasuble (churchar). It is put on over the head, afterward let down on the neck and shoulders, and fastened with a gold chain. It is also known as the ephod, and is supposed to be an inheritance from the Jewish ephod. Some authorities identify it with the Western amice. Also vagas.

vake (vāk), v. i.; pret. and pp. vaked, ppr. vaking. [Also vaik, vaich; < OF. vaquer = Sp. Pg. vacar = It. vacare, < L. vacare, be empty or vacant: see vacant, vacate.] To be vacant or unoccupied; become vacant. [Scotch.]

vakeel, vakil (va-kēl′), n. [< Hind. vakīl, < Ar. vakīl, an advocate.] In the East Indies, an ambassador or special commissioner residing at a court; a native attorney or deputy.

Viziers, vakeels, sirdars, zemindars, generals, captains, potentates, and powers followed in succession, each with his nuzzur and his salaam, whilst the master of the ceremonies recited their titles in a loud, even-toned voice.

Valaisan (va-lā′sạn), a. [< Valais (see def.) + -an.] Of or pertaining to Valais, a canton in the southern part of Switzerland.

valance, valence[1] (val′ạns, -ẹns), n. [Early mod. E. also vallance, valens; < ME. valance, valence, prob. < Valence, in France, still famous for silks (cf. Valenciennes lace, so called from Valenciennes, in France), < L. Valentia, lit. 'strength', < valen(t-)s, ppr. of valere, be strong: see valiant, valentia.] 1. A kind of damask used for furniture-coverings, made of silk, or silk and wool. Also valentia, valencia.

One covering for a fielde bedde of green and valens.
Unton Inventories (ed. Nichols), p. 4.

2. A short curtain used upon a bedstead, or in some similar way, either around the frame upon which the mattress rests (a base-valance), or around the head of the canopy (a tester-valance).

A doubble valance aboute the herce, both aboue and byneith, with his worde and his devise written therine.
Booke of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), i. 30.

Now is Albanos marriage-bed new hung
With fresh rich curtaines! Now are my valence up, Imbost with orient pearle.
Marston, What you Will, iii. 1.

[The sense in the following passage is uncertain.

Cylenius, ryding in his chevauche,
Fro Venus valance mighte his paleys se.
Chaucer, Complaint of Mars, l. 145.]

valance, valence[1] (val′ạns, -ẹns), v. t. [< valance, n.] To furnish or decorate with a valance: figuratively used in the quotation for 'to decorate with a beard.'

Thy face is valanc'd since I saw thee last.
Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2. 442.

valanche† (va-lanch′), n. [Also vollenge; a dial. aphetic form of avalanche.] An avalanche.

The vollenge which overwhelms a whole village was at first but a little snow-ball.
W. Taylor, Survey of German Poetry, II. 456. (Davies.)

The great danger of travelling here when the sun is up proceeds from what they call the valanches.
Smollett, France and Italy, xxxviii.

Valdenses, Valdensian. Same as Waldenses, Waldensian.

vale[1] (vāl), n. [< ME. vale, val, < OF. (and F.) val = Pr. val, valh = Cat. vall = Sp. Pg. It. valle, < L. vallis, a vale; connections uncertain. Hence ult. valley, avale, avalanche, vail[3].] 1. A tract of low ground between hills; a valley: little used except in poetry. See valley.

And when thaire fase war thus for-done,
To the vale of ebron come thai sone.
Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 73.

Along the cool sequestered vale of life
They kept the noiseless tenor of their way.
Gray, Elegy.

I pity people who weren't born in a vale. I don't mean a flat country, but a vale; that is, a flat country bounded by hills. T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, i. 1.

2. A little trough or canal: as, a pump-vale to carry off the water from a ship's pump. = Syn. 1. Dale, etc. See valley.

vale[2]†, n. See vail[3].

vale[3] (vā′lē), interj. [< L. vale, impv. of valere, be strong, be well: see valid, valiant.] Farewell; adieu. Also used substantively.

I remember that once heretofore I wrote unto you a vale or a farewell upon conjecture.
J. Bradford, Letters (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 185.

valediction (val-ẹ̄-dik′shọn), n. [< ML. valedictio(n-)*, < L. valedicere, pp. valedictus, say farewell, < vale, farewell (impv. of valere, be well, be strong: see vale[3]), + dicere, say: see diction. Cf. benediction, malediction.] A farewell; a bidding farewell.

When he went forth of his colledge . . . he alwayes took this solemn valediction of the fellowes.
Fuller, Worthies, Shropshire, III. 66.

Their last valediction, thrice uttered by the attendants, was also very solemn. Sir T. Browne, Urn-burial, iv.

valedictorian (val″ẹ̄-dik-tō′ri-ạn), n. [< valedictory + -an.] In American colleges and some academies and high schools, the student who pronounces the valedictory oration at the annual commencement or graduating exercises of his class: usually chosen as the scholar bearing the highest rank in the graduating class, as the best representative, for various reasons, of the whole class, or as otherwise worthy of special distinction.

valedictory (val-ẹ̄-dik′tọ̄-ri), a. and n. [< NL. as if valedictorius*, < L. valedictus, pp. of valedicere, say farewell: see valediction.] I. a. Bidding farewell; pertaining or relating to a leave-taking or bidding adieu; farewell: as, a valedictory speech.

II. n.; pl. valedictories (-riz). A farewell oration or address (sometimes in Latin), spoken at graduation in American colleges and other institutions by one of the graduating class, usually by the one who has the highest rank. Compare valedictorian.

The valedictory, of course, came last, and I felt rather awkward in rising to declaim my stilted Latin phrases before an audience which had been stirred by such vigorous English. Josiah Quincy, Figures of the Past, p. 56.

valence[1], n. and v. See valance.

valence[2] (vā′lẹns), n. [< LL. valentia, strength, < valen(t-)s, strong, ppr. of valere, be strong: see valiant, valid.] 1. In chem., the relative saturating or combining capacity of an atom compared with the standard hydrogen atom; the quality or force which determines the number of atoms with which any single atom will chemically unite. The original statement of the law of valence was that each atom could combine with a certain definite number of hydrogen atoms, or with an equivalent number of atoms of any other element, and that this number was fixed and unalterable. This number expressed the valence, which was a constant, an invariable property of the element. For example, one atom of phosphorus combines with three atoms of chlorin, forming phosphorus trichlorid. As the chlorin atom is univalent, phosphorus appears to be trivalent. But in phosphorus pentachlorid one atom of phosphorus combines with five of chlorin, and therefore phosphorus in this case appears quinquivalent. In view of facts like these it is held by some authorities that the valence of an element is a varying quality depending on the nature of the other combining atoms, temperature, etc. By others valence is assumed to be invariable, but the total valence is not always exhibited or in force. Also called valency, equivalence, and, less properly, atomicity.

2. In biol.: (a) Form value; morphological value or equivalency. See morphic. (b) In zoöl., taxonomic value or equivalency; classificatory grade or rank of a zoölogical group.

valencia (vā-len′shi-ä̤), n. [See valance.] 1. Same as valance, 1.—2. A linen cloth resembling piqué, used for waistcoats, etc.

valencianite (vā-len′shi-ạn-īt), n. [< Valenciana (see def.) + -ite[2].] In mineral., a variety of orthoclase feldspar, very similar to the adularia of the Alps, found at the silver-mine of Valenciana, Mexico.

Valencia raisins. Raisins prepared by dipping the ripe bunches of grapes into a hot lye made of wood-ashes, oil, and salt, and then drying them in the sun. Raisins of the best quality, known as Malaga or Muscatel, are dried by the sun on the vine. Also called briefly Valencias. See raisin, 2.

Valenciennes (va-loṅ-si-enz′), n. [< Valenciennes, in France.] 1. A rich variety of lace made at Valenciennes, France. See lace.—2. A pyrotechnic composition, usually employed as incendiary.—False Valenciennes lace. See lace.

valency (vā′lẹn-si), n.; pl. valencies (-siz). [As valence[2] (see -cy).] 1. Same as valence[2], 1.—2. A single unit of combining capacity. Thus, carbon is said to have four valencies.

Valenginian (val-en-jin′i-ạn), n. [< Valengin (see def.) + -ian.] In geol., in the nomenclature of the French and Belgian geologists, the name of the lower division of the Neocomian: so called from Valengin, near Neuchâtel.

valentia[1] (vạ-len′shi-ä̤), n. Same as valencia, valance, 1.

Valentia[2] (vạ-len′shi-ä̤), n. [NL. (Stål, 1865).] A genus of hemipterous insects.

valentine (val′en-tīn), n. [< ME. valentine, volontyn*, < OF. valantin, m., valantine, f., a young man or woman betrothed, according to a rural custom, on the first Sunday in Lent, the promise being annulled if the young man failed to give the young woman a present or an entertainment before Mid-Lent (Roquefort); perhaps < valant*, a var. of galant, gallant (see gallant), but popularly identified with the name of St. Valentine (< ME. Valentyne, < OF. Valentin = Sp. Valentin = Pg. Valentim = It. Valentino = G. Sw. Dan. Valentin = D. Velten, Valentijn, < L. Valentinus, a man's name, < valen(t-)s, ppr. of valere, be strong: see valiant, valid), on whose day the choice of valentines came to be made (see def.).] 1. A sweetheart or choice made on St. Valentine's day. This name is derived from St. Valentine, to whom February 14th is sacred. It was a very old notion, alluded to by Shakspere, that on this day birds begin to mate: "For this was on seynt Valentines day, Whan every brid cometh ther to chese his make." Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, l. 310.

Thow it be ale other wyn
Godys blescyng have he and myn
My none [mine own] gentyl Volontyn
Good Tomas the frere.
MS. Harl. 1735, f. 48. (Halliwell.)

To-morrow is St. Valentine's day,
All in the morning betime,
And I a maid at your window,
To be your Valentine.
Shak., Hamlet, iv. 5. 51.

Tell me
What man would satisfy thy present fancy
Had thy ambition leave to choose a Valentine.
B. Jonson, Tale of a Tub, i. 4.

I am also this year my wife's Valentine, and it will cost me 5l.; but that I must have laid out if we had not been Valentines. Pepys, Diary, Feb. 14, 1666.

2. A letter or missive sent by one person to another of the opposite sex on St. Valentine's day; a written or printed or painted missive of an amatory or a satirical kind, generally sent anonymously. The sentimental class are often highly ornamental and expensive productions, usually bearing pretty pictures on the subject of courtship or matrimony; the comic class are generally coarse and vulgar productions, usually with caricatures of the human form depicted on them, and are often meant to reflect on the personal appearance, habits, character, etc., of the recipient.

Valentinian (val-en-tin′i-ạn), a. and n. [< LL. Valentinianus, < L. Valentinus (see def., and cf. valentine) + -i-an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Valentinus or the Valentinians.

II. n. A follower of Valentinus, of the second century, the founder of the most influential and best-known of the Gnostic systems. Valentinus was said to have received his doctrines from a pupil of the apostle Paul, and also by direct revelation. He asserted that from the First Great Cause successively emanated thirty eons, male and female, from the last of which, Wisdom, proceeded a being who was the creator of the world. Christ and the Holy Spirit were two eons later created, and Jesus emanated from all the eons; and the redemption wrought upon earth followed and repeated a redemption wrought in the spiritual world. The Valentinians sought support for their system in an allegorical method of exposition of Scripture, especially of Paul's epistles and the prologue of John's gospel. See Gnostic, eon, 2, demiurge.

Valentinianism (val-en-tin'i-an-izm), n. [< Valentinian + -ism.] The system of doctrines maintained by the Valentinians.

valentinite (val'en-tin-īt), n. [After Basil Valentine, an alchemist of the 15th century, who discovered the properties of antimony.] Native oxid of antimony (Sb_2O_3), occurring in orthorhombic crystals and massive, of a white to brown or pink color and adamantine luster. It has the same composition as senarmontite, but differs in crystalline form. Also called antimony-bloom.

Valentin's corpuscles. Small roundish bodies found in nerve-tissue; amyloid bodies.

valeraldehyde (val-ę-ral'dē-hīd), n. [< valer(ian) + aldehyde.] A mobile liquid having an irritating odor ($C_4H_9.CHO$). It is produced by the oxidation of amyl alcohol. Formerly called valeral. An isomeric valeraldehyde with a fruit-like odor is also known.

valerate (val'ę-rāt), n. [< F. valérate; as valer(ian) + -ate[1].] A salt of valeric acid.

valerian[1] (vā-lē'ri-an), n. [Early mod. E. valeryan; < ME. valerian, < OF. valeriane, F. valériane = Pr. Sp. Pg. It. valeriana = D. valeriaan = Dan. valeriana, < ML. valeriana, valerian, prob. < L. Valerianus or Valerius, a personal name, < valere, be strong: see valiant.]

1. A plant of the genus Valeriana. The common, officinal, or great wild valerian is V. officinalis, native through Europe and Asiatic Russia, cultivated for its medicinal root and somewhat for ornament. It is a herbaceous plant with a perennial rootstock; the stem is erect, from 2 to 4 feet high, and furrowed; the leaves are opposite and pinnate; and the flowers are small, white or pinkish, in terminal corymbs. The root is an officinal drug having the property of a gentle stimulant, with an especial direction to the nerves, applied in hysteria, epilepsy, etc. Its virtue resides chiefly in a volatile oil — the oil of valerian. It is of a pungent disagreeable odor, which is attractive to cats, and also, it is said, to rats; it is therefore used as a bait. In England in the sixteenth century, valerian, under the name of setwall, was regarded as a panacea; but the species appears to have been V. Pyrenaica, a plant there cultivated, and naturalized from Spain. V. Phu from western Asia, called garden valerian, is also cultivated, and affords a root of weaker property. V. Dioscoridis is believed to be the true valerian or phu (φοῦ) of the ancient Greeks. There are three species of valerian in North America, the most notable being V. edulis, edible valerian, whose thickened roots, after prolonged cooking in the ground, formerly formed a staple food of the Digger Indians.

1, Flowering plant of Valerian (Valeriana officinalis); 2, the inflorescence; a, flower with bract; b, section of ovary; c, fruit with pappus.

> Herbes coude I telle eek many oon,
> As egremoin, valerian, and lunarie.
> Chaucer, Prol. to Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 247.

2. The rootstocks of the officinal valerian, or some preparation from them.

> Valerian, calmer of hysteric squirms.
> O. W. Holmes, Rip Van Winkle, M. D., i.

Cats' valerian, the common valerian.—Garden valerian. See def. 1.—Greek valerian, primarily Polemonium cæruleum, the Jacob's-ladder: called by the old herbalists Valeriana Græca, having been mistaken for the valerian of the ancient Greeks. The name is extended to the genus, including the American P. reptans, sometimes named creeping Greek valerian by translation of the (inapt) specific name. It is a much lower plant than the Jacob's-ladder, with weak stems, flowers light-blue, nodding in small corymbs, delicate, and pretty.—Oil of valerian. See def. 1.—Red valerian, Centranthus ruber, native in the Mediterranean region, long cultivated for its handsome oblong panicle of red flowers, which have given it the provincial name of scarlet lightning.—Spur or spurred valerian, the red valerian: thus named from its spurred corolla-tube. See Centranthus.—Valerian-pug, Eupithecia valerianata, a British geometrid moth whose larva feeds on valerian.—Wild valerian, the common valerian.

Valerian[2] (vā-lē'ri-an), a. [< L. Valerius (see def.).] Pertaining to any one of the name of Valerius.—Valerian law, the law proposed and carried by Valerius Publicola when consul (508 B. C.?), granting to every Roman citizen the right of appeal from the summary jurisdiction of consuls.

Valeriana (vā-lē-ri-ā'na), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700; earlier in Lobel, 1576): see valerian[1].] A genus of dicotyledonous plants, type of the family Valerianaceæ, the source of valerian. It is characterized by triandrous flowers with a spurless corolla, and fruit crowned with the pappose limb of the calyx. It contains about 185 species, chiefly perennial herbs with entire, toothed, or dissected leaves, and white or pink flowers, usually in terminal cymes. They inhabit the temperate and arctic regions of both hemispheres, and mountains farther south, a few occurring in India and in Brazil. For the species, see valerian[1], also setwall, nard, 4, and Celtic and Cretan spikenard (under spikenard). There are about 12 species in the United States, mostly western, with one, V. scandens, in southern Florida, and another, V. pauciflora, peculiar to the middle of the eastern and central region. V. uliginosa occurs from New York, and V. edulis from Ohio, northward and westward. See cut under valerian[1].

Valerianaceæ (vā-lē-ri-ą-nā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1815), < Valeriana + -aceæ.] A family of dicotyledonous sympetalous plants of the order Valerianales, by some included in the Rubiales. It is characterized by a 3-celled ovary with two of the cells empty. There are about 275 species, belonging to 9 genera, of which Valeriana (the type), Mitrophora, Nardostachys, Centranthus, and Valerianella are the most important. They are natives of cold north temperate regions of the old world, more abundant in America, especially in the west and the Andes. They are annual or perennial herbs, occasionally somewhat shrubby, usually with a peculiar odor, sometimes a source of perfumes, as in spikenard and some valerians. They bear opposite leaves, often mostly radical, and flowers usually sessile in dichotomous cymes, either white, red, or bluish, or, in the genus Fedia, yellow. Although the family is closely related to the Asteraceæ, the inflorescence is seldom at all capitate or involucellate. The fruit is an achene crowned with the persistent border of the calyx. Many of the species are highly esteemed in medicine for tonic, anti-spasmodic, or stimulating properties.

valerianate (vā-lē'ri-an-āt), n. [< valerian[1] + -ate[1].] A salt of valeric acid.

Valerianella (vā-lē-ri-ą-nel'ą), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < Valeriana + dim. -ella.] A genus of dicotyledonous plants, of the family Valerianaceæ, chiefly distinguished from Valeriana by its toothed, lobed, awned, or horned, but never pappous calyx. There are about 50 species, annual herbs, dichotomously branched, with entire, dentate, or pinnatifid leaves, and cymes of white, pale-blue, or pink flowers. The genus is chiefly confined to the Mediterranean region, extending into central Europe, but occurs in North America, and a few species are widely naturalized. Several species produce tender foliage, eaten as lettuce. V. olitoria, a species with pale-green leaves and small slate-colored flowers, widely diffused in Europe, North Africa, and Asia, formerly known as white potherb and lamb's-lettuce, and latterly as corn-salad, is now often cultivated under glass as an early salad under the name of fetticus. (See cut under dichotomy.) Fourteen species, formerly classed under the related monotypic genus Mitrophora, are natives of the United States; four species of Oregon are peculiar in their spurred corollas. V. Woodsiana, with roundish, and V. chenopodifolia, with somewhat triangular fruit, extend from the south into New York.

valerianic (vā-lē-ri-an'ik), a. [< valerian[1] + -ic.] Same as valeric.

vallate (val'āt), a. [< L. vallatus, pp. of vallare, surround with a rampart, < vallum, a rampart, wall.] 1. In anat., surrounded with a walled depression; circumvallate. [Rare.]—2. In zoöl., cupped; cup-shaped. [Rare.]

The sponge is goblet-shaped in general form, and not simply vallate, like T. prolifera.
Micros. Science, N. S., XXXII. 3.

vallated (val'ā-ted), a. [< vallate + -ed[2].] Surrounded with or as with a rampart. [Rare.]

The favorite but not vallated domain of literature is æsthetics in its true meaning. Science, XII. 305.

vallation† (va-lā'shon), n. [< LL. vallatio(n-), a rampart or intrenchment, < L. vallare, surround with a rampart: see vallate.] A rampart or intrenchment. T. Warton, Hist. Kiddington, p. 70.

vallatory† (val'a-tō-ri), a. [< vallate + -ory.] Pertaining to a rampart or vallum.

Mention is made in Ezekiel of "a measuring reed of six cubits"; . . . and with such differences of reeds, vallatory, sagittary, scriptory, and others, they might be furnished in Judea. Sir T. Browne, Misc., i. § 47.

vallecula (va-lek'ū-lä), n.; pl. valleculæ (-lē). [LL., also vallicula, dim. of vallis, valles, vale: see vale[1].] 1. In anat., a depression or furrow.—2. In bot., a groove or furrow, as on the stems of Equisetum or between the ribs of an umbelliferous fruit; a stria.—Vallecula cerebelli (valley of the cerebellum), a depression on the under surface of the cerebellum, in which lies the medulla oblongata. See cut under brain.—Vallecula Sylvii, the depression at the beginning of the fissure of Sylvius, the bottom of which is formed by the anterior perforated space. See cut under cerebral.—Vallecula unguis, the recess, formed by a duplication of the skin, in which the root of a nail lies.

vallecular (va-lek'ū-lär), a. [< vallecula + -ar[3].] Of or pertaining to a vallecula or groove. Also vallicular.—Vallecular canal, in bot., in Equisetaceæ, an intercellular canal lying within the cortical parenchyma, opposite a groove on the surface of the stem.

valleculate (va-lek'ū-lāt), a. [< vallecula + -ate[1].] Having a vallecula or valleculæ. Also valliculate.

Valleix's points. Tender spots found by pressure along the course of a nerve in certain cases of neuralgia.

Vallet's pills. Pills of carbonate of iron.

valley (val'i), n. [Early mod. E. also vallie; < ★ME. valey, valeye, valaye, vale = MD. valleye, valey, D. vallei, < OF. valee, F. vallée (= It.

vallata), a valley, vale, ‹ val, a vale, ‹ L. vallis, valles, a vale: see vale[1]. The Rom. forms were prob. confused with ML. vallata, f., also vallatum, n., a ditch, a place surrounded by a ditch, ‹ L. vallatus, pp. of vallare, surround with a rampart or intrenchment: see vallate.] 1. A depression, or a relatively low and somewhat level area, more or less completely inclosed by uplands, hills, or mountains; the part of a river basin which lies near the river and is not much raised above its level. The 'valley of California' is for the most part a great plain, between the Sierra Nevada and the Coast range, drained by many rivers. The 'Mississippi valley' is often used in a general sense to include much of the lower land between the highlands on the east and west. In phys. geog., valley is more specifically used to name the depression formed by the erosive action of a river or stream, aided by the weathering and washing of the slopes that lead down to it. Thus it results that the surface of the continents is nearly everywhere characterized by valley systems as well as by river systems; as Playfair wrote in 1802, the valleys are proportioned to the rivers and have so nice an adjustment of their declivities that no side valley joins the main valley either on too high or too low a level; "a circumstance which would be infinitely improbable if each of these valleys were not the work of the streams that flow through them." The depth to which a valley may be eroded depends chiefly on the altitude to which the original land surface was uplifted; the form of the valley depends partly on the rock structure of the land mass, partly on the stage of valley development. Valleys in a young stage of development are narrow; in a mature stage, open; while in an old stage, the sides are worn to so gentle a slope that the valley is merely a shallow depression in the peneplain to which the region has by that time been reduced. Valleys are further classified, according to their relation to rock structures, as anticlinal, cataclinal, monoclinal, synclinal, etc. They are also named according to the kind of rivers that have eroded them, as consequent, subsequent, etc. See river. A drowned valley is the lower part of a valley which has been transformed into a bay or estuary by a depression of the region; a hanging valley is one which opens in the side wall and above the floor of a main valley, this exceptional relation being usually best explained as the result of glacial erosion, whereby the main valley has been over-deepened. Many hanging valleys occur in Alaska, the Alps, Norway, and other glaciated regions. A longitudinal valley is parallel to the trend of the ridges that inclose it; a transverse valley runs square across the structure of the district in which it is eroded; a through-going valley (equivalent of the German "Durchbruchsthal") is eroded through an upland or highland that rises between lowlands; a gap or water-gap is a valley of this kind in which the upland is narrowed to a ridge. In popular language, and especially in local dialects, valleys have their forms characterized by terms suited to express the great variety of features which they exhibit: thus, in English, dale, dell, dingle, cove, comb, gully, ravine, gorge, defile, chasm, and many others; in French, combe, cluse, cirque, etc.; in Spanish, cañada (changed to cañon or canyon in the western United States), barranca, quebrada, etc.; and so through all the various languages and countries.

For he chased a saisne that he hath ouertake in this derke valey, and hath hym smetyn down.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 195.

Through these fore-named vallies glide Simois and divine Scamander. Sandys, Travailes, p. 17.

From the top of a high hill, or of a mountain beneath the snow-line, one may sometimes look down upon a wide region and mark, as in a vast map or model, how the little gullies on the sides of the slopes widen out into larger channels, how these run together into valleys, and how the whole landscape seems thus to be trenched with water-courses. A. Geikie, Phys. Geog., p. 344.

2. Hence, any similar depression of any size. —3. Specifically, in arch., the internal angle formed by the meeting of two inclined sides of a roof. The rafter which supports the valley is called the valley-rafter or valley-piece, and the board fixed upon it for the metallic gutter to lie upon is termed the valley-board.—Cream of the valley. See cream[1].—Synclinal valley. See synclinal.—Valley of the cerebellum. Same as vallecula cerebelli (which see, under vallecula).
=Syn. 1. Valley, Vale, Dale, Glen, Ravine, Defile, Gorge, Cañon. These words differ a good deal, according to locality. Valley is the general word (see def.), but may represent a region much larger than any of the others: as, the valleys of the Amazon and the Mississippi. Vale is a poetic or elevated word for a small valley. Dale belongs chiefly to the north of England, and is used of a small valley, especially if cultivated or cultivable. The popular notion of a glen is that it is secluded and shady. A ravine is narrow and relatively long. A defile is a narrow passageway, especially among hills—a pass so narrow that troops can go through only by a narrow front, as by files. A gorge is presumably deep, with sides somewhat if not quite precipitous. Cañon is a local word (see def.), without figurative extension as yet.

valley-board (val′i-bōrd), n. See valley, 3.

valleylet (val′i-let), n. [‹ valley + -let.] A little valley. [Rare.]

valley-rafter (val′i-rȧf″tėr), n. See valley, 3. By old writers valley-rafters were termed sleepers.

vallicula (va-lik′ū-lä), n.; pl. valliculæ (-lē). Same as vallecula.

vallicular (va-lik′ū-lär), a. Same as vallecular.

valliculate (va-lik′ū-lāt), a. Same as vallecular.

Vallisneria (val-is-nē′ri-ä), n. [NL. (Micheli, 1729), named after Antonio Vallisnieri (1661–1730), an Italian naturalist.] 1. A genus of monocotyledonous plants, belonging to, and type of, the family Vallisneriaceæ. It is distinguished from the other two genera of the tribe by its simple perianth, few stamens (one to three), and the absence of a beak to the fruit. There is but one species, V. spiralis, the tape-grass or eel-grass, an aquatic plant common in fresh water, especially slow-flowing rivers, throughout the temperate and warmer regions of both hemispheres. It is a submerged herb with a very short stem, sometimes stoloniferous; very long and narrowly linear leaves crowded together at the base within a short sheath; and dioecious flowers on scapes, the male scapes very short, bearing clusters of buds within a spathe. These buds break from their short pedicels, and rise to the surface, where they open, and shed their pollen among the fertile flowers, which are raised to the surface on long filiform scapes. These latter subsequently coil up spirally, drawing the fertilized flowers under water to mature their fruit, which is berry-like, cylindrical, and elongated, and filled with numerous oblong seeds. The plant is common in cultivation in aquariums, its rapid growth aiding to aërate the water. In streams flowing into Chesapeake Bay, where it grows in great masses, it is known as water-celery or wild celery, and is said to be a favorite food of the canvasback duck and of the terrapin, and to impart to them their peculiar flavor. In Australia it is locally known as spring-plant. The square or oblong cells of its delicate flat leaves often exhibit to a remarkable degree the phenomenon of cyclosis, or active movement of protoplasm, the current of protoplasm carrying all the cell-contents, including the chlorophyl-grains and nucleus, in continual rotation around the cell, close to the inside of its wall. It is therefore much used for laboratory demonstration. See cut under dioecious.

2. [l. c.] A plant of this genus.

Vallisneriaceæ (val-is-nē-ri-ā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Dumortier, 1829), ‹ Vallisneria + -aceæ.] A family of monocotyledonous plants of the order Naiadales, equivalent to the Hydrocharidaceæ (which see) of certain authors.

Vallisnieæ (val″is-nē-rī′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Endlicher, 1837), ‹ Vallisneria + -eæ.] A tribe of plants, of the family Vallisneriaceæ. It originally consisted of the two genera Vallisneria, the type, and Saivala. In Engler's system the latter is placed in another tribe.

Vallota (va-lō′tä), n. [NL. (Herbert, 1821), probably named after J. N. Vallot, a French botanist (beginning of 19th century).] A genus of plants, of the family Amaryllidaceæ and tribe Amarylldeæ. It is characterized by a broadly funnel-shaped perianth with short tube usually involucrate with three bracts, furnished with a small callus between contiguous lobes, and by numerous ovules in two vertical rows in each cell, ripening into winged seeds. The only species, V. purpurea, is a native of South Africa. It is a bulbous plant with thong-like leaves and a stout scape bearing an umbel of numerous large scarlet flowers, erect and nearly or quite sessile. It is cultivated under the ★name of Scarborough lily.

vallum (val′um), n.; pl. valla (-ä). [L., a rampart: see wall[1].] 1. A rampart; a palisaded rampart; a line of intrenchment; specifically, Vallum.

Part of the Roman Wall near Carrow, in the north of England. a a, ramparts; b b, ditches or fosses; w, wall.

the rampart with which the Romans inclosed their camps. It consisted essentially of two parts, the agger, or mound of earth, and the sudes, or palisades, that were driven into the ground to secure and strengthen it. 2. In anat., the supercilium or eyebrow.

Valois head-dress. A style of dressing women's hair in fashion about 1850, the hair being drawn back from the forehead, and forming a roll on the crown of the head.

valonia (vȧ-lō′ni-ä), n. [‹ It. vallonia, ‹ Gr. βάλανος, an acorn, an oak.] The commercial name for the acorn-cups of the valonia-oak, which are imported into Great Britain in large quantities from Asia Minor and Greece for use in tanning, dyeing, and making ink. They are of large size, and yield from 25 to 40 per cent. of tannin. Leather tanned with this material has a rich bloom, and is little permeable by water.

valonia-oak (vȧ-lō′ni-ä-ōk), n. An oak, Quercus Ægilops, of Greece and the Levant. It is a handsome tree, 30 or 40 feet high, nearly evergreen, with large prickly cupped acorns. The cups form valonia, and the immature acorns camata. The wood is useful, particularly for cabinet-making.

valor, valour (val′ọr), n. [Early mod. E. also valure; ‹ ME. valour, ‹ OF. valour, valur, later valeur, strength, valor, value. F. valeur = Sp. Pg. valor = It. valore, ‹ ML. valor, strength, valor, LL. value, worth, ‹ L. valere, be strong, be worth: see valiant.] 1. Strength of mind in resisting fear and braving danger; bravery; especially, courage and skill in fighting.

I knowe well I haue don right euell, not for than I shall lete hem well wite that I am not hidde, yef in me be so moche valoure, though I sholde be deed or all to hewen.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 405.

Discretion, the best part of valour.
Beau. and Fl., King and no King, iv. 3.

Some men's valours are in the eyes of them that look on.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, i.

2†. Value; worth.

For goode dede done thurgh praiere
Is sold and bought to deere iwys,
To herte that of grete valour [var. valure, 16th cent. edd.] is.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 5236.

And a Coppe ys inestymable, ffor they be full sett with precious stunys of grett valour that may be.
Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 11.

Of small valure, O lady fair, alas, my name it is!
Peele, Sir Clyomon and Sir Clamydes.

Valure wins applause
That dares but to maintain the weaker cause.
B. Jonson, The Barriers.

3. A man of courage; a brave man. [Rare.]

Leading young valours—reckless as myself.
Bulwer, Richelieu, i. 1.

=Syn. 1. Courage, gallantry. See brave.

valorous (val′ọr-us), a. [‹ F. valeureux = It. valoroso, ‹ ML. valorosus, valorous, ‹ L. valor, strength, valor: see valor.] 1. Having or displaying valor; brave; courageous; valiant; intrepid: as, a valorous knight.

The knight, yet wrothfull for his late disgrace, Fiercely advaunst his valorous right arme.
Spenser, F. Q., II. xi. 34.

The most valorous Hector. Shak., T. and C., iii. 3. 275.

2. Characteristic of or pertaining to valor.

Full well they know the valorous heat that runs
In every pulse-beat of their loyal sons.
O. W. Holmes, A Family Record.

3†. Having value; valuable.

Thy garments shall be made of Median silk,
Enchased with precious jewels of mine own,
More rich and valurous than Zenocrate's.
Marlowe, Tamburlaine, I., i. 2.

=Syn. 1. See brave.

valorously (val′ọr-us-li), adv. In a valorous or brave manner; valiantly.

Hold to the track on which thou enteredst in thy early youth, which thou pursuedst as consul so valorously and bravely. Cicero to Atticus, tr. in Froude's Cæsar, xii.

Valparaiso oak. See live-oak.

Valsa (val′sä), n. [NL. (Adanson, 1763).] According to the interpretation of recent authors, a genus of sphæriaceous fungi, having the perithecia immersed in the cortex of the host, and eight-spored or rarely four-spored asci, which are sessile without paraphyses.

Valsalvan (val-sal′vạn), a. [‹ Valsalva (see def.) + -an.] Of or pertaining to the Italian anatomist Valsalva (1666–1723).—Valsalvan experiment, the forcing of air into the middle ear by a forcible expiration while the mouth and nose are closed.—Valsalvan ligament, a fibrous band running from the pinna of the ear to the temporal bone.—Valsalvan method, an attempt to obtain coagulation in an aneurism by reducing the force of the circulation by blood-letting, purgation, and a low diet.—Valsalvan sinus. See sinus of Valsalva, under sinus.

valuable (val′ū-ȧ-bl), a. and n. [Early mod. E. also valiable; altered, to suit value (as if directly ‹ value + -able), ‹ OF. valable, of force or value, valuable, ‹ valoir, be of force or value: see value.] I. a. 1. Capable of being valued; capable of having the value measured or estimated.

Commodities are moveables, valuable by money, the common measure.
Locke, Further Considerations concerning Raising the Value of Money.

I never value people as they value me, but as they are valuable. Sydney Smith, To Countess Grey, Nov. 1, 1821.

2. Of great value or price; having financial worth; representing a large market value: as, a valuable horse; valuable land; a valuable house.—3. Of great moral worth, utility, or importance; precious; worthy; estimable; deserving esteem: as, a valuable friend; a valuable companion.

One example is more valiable, both to good and ill, than xx. preceptes written in bookes.
Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 66.

He ought to think no man valuable but for his public spirit, justice, and integrity. Steele, Spectator, No. 340.

Alumn is esteemed a very valuable charm against the evil eye. E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, I. 323.

Valuable consideration. See consideration.=Syn. 2 and 3. Valuable, Costly, Precious, useful, serviceable. That is valuable which has value, however small, and whether pecuniary or otherwise. That is costly which has cost or would cost a large sum of money: figuratively, we may sometimes call that costly which has cost work, sacrifice, or the like, or inflicted loss: as, a costly mistake or victory; but such use is not common. That is precious which has a very high intrinsic value; hence the term "precious metals"; a precious stone is also called a jewel; figuratively, a precious child is one very dear for his own sake. A costly stone is one that has been made expensive by carving, polishing, transportation from a great distance, or the like, as the sarcophagus of Napoleon I.; in 1 Cor. iii. 12 the revised version corrects "precious stones" to "costly stones." A valuable stone is one that can be made useful in some way, and therefore must not be thrown away. That which we value for its associations would be called more or less precious or dear, rather than valuable.

II. n. A thing, especially a small thing, of value; a choice article of personal property; any piece of precious merchandise, usually of small bulk: generally in the plural.

Inclining (with my usual cynicism) to think that he did steal the valuables.
Thackeray, Roundabout Papers, On a Medal of George [the Fourth.

valuableness (val′ū-a-bl-nes), n. The character of being valuable; preciousness; worth.

valuation (val-ū-ā′shọn), n. [= Sp. valuación; as value + -ation.] 1. The act of valuing. Specifically—(a) The act of estimating the value or worth; the act of setting a price; appraisement: as, a valuation of lands for the purpose of taxation. (b) The act of duly valuing; estimation; appreciation: as, the just valuation of civil and religious privileges.

2. Value set upon a thing; estimated worth; value; worth.

The mines lie vnlaboured, and of no valuation.
Hakluyt's Voyages, III. 466.

So slight a valuation. Shak., Cymbeline, iv. 4. 49.

Home valuation, valuation or appraisement of imported merchandise according to the market prices at the port of import: in contradistinction to foreign valuation, the method commonly in use by appraising according to the valuation of the foreign port or country of export. The principle of home valuation was introduced in the United States by the act of Congress of March 2d, 1833, which provided for a gradual reduction of duties, to be followed in 1842 by the principle of home valuation according to regulations to be prescribed, which, however, were never introduced.

valuational (val-ū-ā′shọn-al), a. [< valuation + -al.] Of or pertaining to valuation. Contemporary Rev., LI. 285. [Rare.]

valuator (val′ū-ā-tọr), n. [< value + -at-or.] One who sets a value; an appraiser. Swift, Considerations upon Two Bills.

value (val′ū), n. [Early mod. E. also valew; < ME. valew, value, < OF. value (= It. valuta), worth, value, < value, fem. of valu, pp. of valoir, < L. valere, be strong, be worth: see valiant, valor.] 1. Worth; the property or properties of a thing in virtue of which it is useful or estimable, or the degree in which such a character is possessed; utility; importance; excellence: applied to both persons and things.

Ye are all physicians of no value. Job xiii. 4.

Ye are of more value than many sparrows. Mat. x. 31.

We had our Water measured out to us, 2 Pints a Man per day, till we came into our Channel. This was the first time that I began to know the value of fresh Water.
Dampier, Voyages, II. iii. 5.

To loyal hearts the value of all gifts
Must vary as the giver's.
Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

Always we are daunted by the appearances, not seeing that their whole value lies at bottom in the state of mind.
Emerson, War.

The only value of universal characters is that they help us, by reasoning, to know new truths about individual things. W. James, Prin. of Psychol., I. 479.

2. Estimated or attributed worth; appreciation; valuation; esteem; regard.

Neither the pomp and grandeur of the World, nor the smiles and flatteries of it, no, nor its frowns and severities, could abate anything of that mighty esteem and value which he [Paul] had for the Christian Religion.
Stillingfleet, Sermons, I. iv.

I am not vain enough to boast that I have deserved the value of so illustrious a line.
Dryden, To the Duke of Ormond, Ded. of Fables.

Cæsar is well acquainted with your virtues,
And therefore sets this value on your life.
Addison, Cato, ii. 2.

I have a very great Value for Mr. Bevil, but have absolutely put an End to his Pretensions.
Steele, Conscious Lovers, iii. 1.

3. The importance of a commodity measured by the amount of other commodities (commonly represented by money) for which it can be exchanged in open market; the ratio in which one thing exchanges against others; the command which one commodity has over others in traffic; in a restricted (and the popular) sense, the amount of money for which a thing can be sold; price. In political economy value is distinguished from price, which is worth estimated in money, while value is worth estimated in commodities in general.

So thei departed to pore knyghtes and squeres that neuer after were pore, in so moche that thei kepte not to hem-self the valew of a peny. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 167.

They [the Switzers] found there great spoyles that the Duke left behind, to the valew of three Millions.
Coryat, Crudities, I. 42.

By the price of a thing, therefore, we shall henceforth understand its value in money; by the value, or exchange value of a thing, its general power of purchasing, the command which its possession gives over purchaseable commodities in general. J. S. Mill, Pol. Econ., III. i. § 2.

The word value, so far as it can be correctly used, merely expresses the circumstance of its [a commodity's] exchanging in a certain ratio for some other substance.
Jevons, Pol. Econ., iv.

He could not manage finance; he knew values well, but he had no keenness of imagination for monetary results in the shape of profit and loss.
George Eliot, Middlemarch, xxiv.

The sense proper to value in economic discussion may, I think, be said to be universally agreed upon by economists, and I may, therefore, at once define it as expressing the ratio in which commodities in open market are exchanged against each other.
J. E. Cairnes, Pol. Econ., I. i. § 1.

4. Price equal to the intrinsic worth of a thing; real equivalent.

His design was not to pay him the value of his pictures, because they were above any price. Dryden.

Worn gold coin received at its bullion value.
Rep. of Sec. of Treasury, 1886, p. 329.

5. Import; precise signification: as, the value of a word or phrase.—6. In music, the relative length or duration of a tone signified by a note: as, a half-note has the value of two quarter-notes, or four sixteenth-notes; to give a note its full value.—7. In painting and the allied arts, relation of one object, part, or atmospheric plane of a picture to the others, with reference to light and shade, the idea of hue being abstracted. Thus, a picture in which the values are correct is one in which the distribution and interdependence of the light and dark parts correspond to nature, and particularly preserve the correct rendering of different distances from the observer; while a detail in a picture which is out of value is one which is too light or too dark in tone for the atmospheric plane which it should occupy, or for the proper rendering of its relations to other objects in the same plane.

It strikes us that the figure of the young preacher standing erect in the lofty pulpit has less value and atmospheric envelopment than it should possess in relation to the rest of the composition. The Academy, No. 890, p. 365.

With all our knowledge of to-day, the values of this landscape could not be better expressed; the composition is most natural and original, and were it not for the lack of truth in the values of the figures, and for the intense piety of the sentiment, it might have been painted yesterday.
Scribner's Mag., IV. 717.

8. In math., the special determination of a quantity. Quantities in mathematics are identified by their general definitions, as satisfying certain conditions, and are variable, or otherwise indeterminate. A completely determinate quantity, or, more precisely, the quantity of a completely determinate quantum, is a value. Value is distinguished from magnitude in that the latter refers only to a modulus, or numerical measure, neglecting in some measure distinctions of kind, while two quantities which are not equal have not the same value, though they may have the same magnitude.

9. In biol., grade or rank in classification; valence: as, a group having the value of a family.—Annual value. See annual.—Form value, in biol., morphic valence; that grade of structural simplicity or complexity which any organism presents, or represents as compared with another: as, an ovum and an amœba have alike the form value of the simple cell; any sea-urchin has the form value of echinoderms.—Good value, full value or worth in exchange: as, to get good value for one's money.—Local, market, minimum, multiple, par, principal value. See the qualifying words.—Surplus value. See the quotation.

The fundamental principle of the Marx school and of the whole cognate socialism is the theory of surplus value,—the doctrine, namely, that, after the labourer has been paid the wage necessary for the subsistence of himself and family, the surplus produce of his labour is appropriated by the capitalist who exploits it.
Encyc. Brit., XXII. 211.

Surrender value. See surrender, 2.—Terminal value. See terminal.—Value in exchange, exchange value, and exchangeable value, phrases often used to distinguish value in the economic sense (see def. 3) from its more general meaning of 'utility.'

The things which have the greatest value in use have frequently little or no value in exchange; and, on the contrary, those which have the greatest value in exchange have frequently little or no value in use.
Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations, i. 4.

Value of money. See money.—Value received, a phrase used especially to indicate that a promissory note has been made, or a bill of exchange has been accepted, for a valuable consideration, and not by way of accommodation.=Syn. 1-4. Worth, Cost, etc. (see price), Income, Revenue, Profit, etc. See income.

value (val′ū), v. t.; pret. and pp. valued, ppr. valuing. [< value, n.] 1. To estimate the value or worth of; specifically, to rate at a certain price; appraise: as, to value lands or goods.

This is the brief of money, plate, and jewels
I am possess'd of; 'tis exactly valued.
Shak., A. and C., v. 2. 138.

I thank God, the School of Affliction hath brought me to such a Habit of Patience, it has caused in me such Symptoms of Mortification, that I can value this World as it is. Howell, Letters, iv. 39.

There was in London a renowned chain of pearls which was valued at ten thousand pounds.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

2. To consider with respect to value, worth, or importance; rate, whether high or low; regard.

The king must take it ill,
That he 's so slightly valu'd in his messenger.
Shak., Lear, ii. 2. 153.

So little knows
Any, but God alone, to value right
The good before him. Milton, P. L., iv. 202.

After the initial investigation comes the criticism; first we have to identify, then we have to value, our historical inventory. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 76.

3. Specifically, to rate high; have in high esteem; set much by; prize; appreciate; regard; hold in respect or estimation; reflexively, to pride (one's self).

Value the judicious, and let not mere acquests in minor parts of learning gain thy pre-existimation.
Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., ii. 4.

These gentlemen . . . value themselves upon being critics in rust, and will undertake to tell you the different ages of it by its colour. Addison, Ancient Medals, i.

I valued myself upon being a strict monogamist.
Goldsmith, Vicar, ii.

A man valuing himself as the organ of this or that dogma is a dull companion enough. Emerson, Clubs.

4. To reckon or estimate with respect to number or power; compute; compare (with another person or thing) with respect to price or excellence.

It cannot be valued with the gold of Ophir.
Job xxviii. 16.

The queen is valued thirty thousand strong.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., v. 3. 14.

5. To take account of; take into account; hence, to care for; consider as important.

If a man be in sickness or pain, the time will seem longer without a clock, . . . for the mind doth value every moment. Bacon, Colours of Good and Evil, v.

I want 'em [maps], and I don't value the price, but I would have the most exact.
John Tipper, in Ellis's Lit. Letters, p. 315.

6†. To raise to estimation; cause to have value, either real or apparent.

Some value themselves to their country by jealousies to the crown. Sir W. Temple.

7†. To give out or represent as wealthy, or financially sound.

The scriveners and brokers do value unsound men to serve their own turn. Bacon, Riches (ed. 1887).

8†. To be worth; be equal in worth to; be an equivalent of.

The peace between the French and us not values
The cost that did conclude it.
Shak., Hen. VIII., i. 1. 88.

Valued policy. See policy[2].=Syn. 3. Prize, Esteem, etc. See appreciate.

valueless (val′ū-les), a. [< value + -less.] Destitute of value; having no worth; worthless. Shak., K. John, iii. 1. 101.

valuelessness (val′ū-les-nes), n. The character of being valueless; worthlessness.

valuer (val′ū-ėr), n. [< value + -er[1].] One who values, in any sense.

Experienced valuers promptly sent.
N. and Q., 7th ser., X., Adv.

valuret, n. An old form of valor.

valurous†, a. An obsolete variant of valorous.

valva (val′vä), n.; pl. valvæ (-vē). [NL., < L. valva, the leaf of a door.] 1. In anat. and zoöl., a valve or valvula.—2. In entom., the maxilla of a bee, which in repose folds against the tongue. See cut under Hymenoptera. Kirby.—Valva bicuspis, the bicuspid valve of the heart, now called mitral valve. See valve.—Valva tricuspis, the tricuspid valve of the heart. See tricuspid.

valval (val′vạl), a. [< valva + -al.] In bot., of or pertaining to a valve: specifically noting that view or position of a diatom in which one of the valves of the frustule is next the observer, as opposed to zonal, in which the line of union of the two valves is nearest. The position is also spoken of as valve-view.

valvar (val′vär), a. [< valva + -ar[3].] Valve-like; of or pertaining to a valve or valves; valvular.

valvasor (val′vā-sôr), n. See vavasor.

valvate (val′vāt), a. [< L. valvatus, having folding doors, < valva, the leaf of a door: see valve.] 1. In anat. and zoöl.: (a) Like a valve in form or function; resembling or serving for a valve; forming a valve; valvular; valviform: as, a valvate fold of membrane. (b) Having a valve; provided with valves; valviferous; valvated: as, valvate vessels; a valvate orifice.—2. In bot., united by the margins only, and opening as if by doors or valves, as the capsules of regularly dehiscent fruits, the anthers of certain Ericaceæ, and the parts of a perianth which in the bud meet without overlapping: said also of an estivation thus characterized.

a, the valvate estivation of the corolla of Parthenocissus quinquefolia; b, the flower of the same, open; c, stamen of Berberis vulgaris, with the anther dehiscing with valves; d, pod of Campe Barbarea with valvate dehiscence.

★valve (valv), n. [< F. valve = Sp. Pg. It. valva, < L. valva, the leaf of a double door, pl. valvæ, folding doors, NL. a valve.] 1. One of the leaves of a folding door; in the plural, a folding door.

> Swift thro' the valves the visionary fair > Repass'd.
>
> Pope, Odyssey, iv. 1093.

> Heavily closed, with a jarring sound, the valves of the barn-doors.
> Longfellow, Evangeline, i. 2.

2. Any device or appliance used to control the flow of a liquid, vapor, or gas, or loose material in bulk, through a pipe, passageway, outlet, or inlet, in any form of containing vessel. In this wide and general sense, the term includes air-, gas-, steam-, and water-cocks of any kind, water-gates, air-gates, and keys to musical wind-instruments. Rotary valves are valves in which the leaf, disk, plug, or other device used to close the passage is made to revolve for opening or closing (the common stop-cock being an illustration); lifting-valves are those in which the ball, cone, or other stopper is lifted or raised clear of the valve-seat by pressure (usually that of the gas, steam, or liquid in the pipe) from below, the poppet-, ball-, and safety-valves being examples; hinged valves constitute a large class used in both air- and water-pipes, as the butterfly-valves, clack-valves, and other forms in which the leaf or plate of the valve is fastened on one side to the valve-seat or opening. Springs are sometimes used to keep such valves closed. Sliding valves are those in which the gate or leaf slides aside to open the valve-way, the D-valve and some forms of water- and gas-main valves being examples. The long-hinged valves of a pipe-organ, and the round stoppers operated by keys, as in the flute and other instruments, are called key-valves. The names by which valves are distinguished are often descriptive of the shape or motion of the valves, of their use, or of the method by which they are operated, as globe-valve, screw-valve, blow-through valve, relief-valve, throttle-valve. In a trade sense, valves appear to be distinguished from cocks. A cock is a small plug-valve operated by hand. Other valves moved by screws or levers, or operated by power through some machinery, all self-acting appliances, and all large or complicated gates, stoppers, or cocks, are called valves. The universal use of steam, gas, and water has led to the invention of a great variety of valves. In musical wind-instruments of the trumpet class, the valve is a device for changing the direction and length of the air-column so as to alter the pitch of the tone. The two forms most in use are the piston and the rotary valve—the former being a perforated plunger working in a cylindrical case, and the latter a four-way cock, both being operated by the fingers of the player's right hand. The result of using a valve is to add to the main tube of the instrument a supplementary tube or crook of such length that the proper tone of the whole is lowered by some definite interval. The number of valves is commonly three, the first lowering the fundamental tone a whole step (and all its harmonics proportionally), the second lowering it a half-step, and the third a step and a half. A fourth valve is sometimes added on large instruments, lowering the pitch two steps and a half; and five and six valves have occasionally been tried. Two or more valves are used simultaneously with combined effect. Valves are more or less demanded to compensate for the incompleteness of the scale of all instruments of this family, and to provide for rapid changes of tonality. They are also useful in particular cases to remedy the inaccuracy for concerted music of certain of the regular harmonic series of tones. Their extended application has greatly developed the capacity of all kinds of brass instruments for rapid and unrestricted execution. But on the other hand valves and supplementary crooks cannot always give exactly accurate intonation, and the angles which they more or less necessitate in the air-column tend to injure the purity of the tones. Various compensations for these drawbacks have been attempted, with some success; but valve-instruments are still seldom used in the orchestra, while they are numerous in military bands. See piston, 2, and compare key[1], 4 (a). See cuts under back-pressure, ball-cock, conical organ, reed-organ, twin-valve, slide-valve, steam-engine, safety-valve.

3. In anat. and zoöl., a membranous part, fold, or thin layer which resembles a valve, or actually serves as a valve in connection with the flow of blood, lymph, or other fluid; a valva or valvula: as, the valve of Vieussens in the brain; the connivent valves of Kerkring in the intestine; valves of the heart, of the veins, etc. See cuts under bulb, Crinoidea, heart, lymphatic, and vein.—4. In bot., in flowering plants, one of the segments into which a capsule dehisces, or which opens like a lid in the dehiscence of certain anthers. In Diatomaceæ each half of the silicified membrane or shell is called a valve. See cuts under Marsilea, septicidal, and silicle.—5. In conch., one of the two or more separable pieces of which the shell may consist, or the whole shell when it is in one piece; each shell, right and left, of ordinary bivalves, and each shell, dorsal and ventral, of brachiopods. See bivalve, multivalve, univalve, equivalve, inequivalve, and cuts under Caprotinidæ, Chamidæ, integropalliate, and sinupalliate.—6. In entom., a covering plate or sheath of any organ, generally one of a pair of plates which unite to form a tube or vagina, as those covering the external sexual organs, ovipositor, etc.—Accessory, aortic, back-pressure, basal valve. See the qualifying words.—Auriculoventricular valves, valves guarding either auriculoventricular orifice of the heart: on the right side the tricuspid, on the left the mitral. See cuts under heart.—Bauhinian valve. Same as ileocæcal valve.—Bicuspid valve. Same as mitral valve.—Blow-through, brake-shoe, conical valve. See blow-through, etc.—Connivent valves. See valvulæ conniventes, under valvula.—Coronary valve. See coronary.—Cylindrical valve. See cylindric.—Delivery-valve. See delivery.—Eustachian valve. See Eustachian.—Gridiron valve. See gridiron.—Hasner's valve, an imperfect valve formed by the mucous membrane at the meatal end of the nasal duct.—Heister's valve, folds of mucous membrane at the neck of the gall-bladder and in the cystic duct, which present the appearance of a spiral valve. See cut under stomach.—Hydraulic, hypopygial, ileocæcal, inferior valve. See the adjectives.—Ileocolic valve. Same as ileocæcal valve.—Kingston valve, a valve with connections through the skin or sheathing of a vessel through which the water from without may be admitted to condensers and the like, or through which water from within the hull may be expelled.—Long valve, in a steam-engine, same as long slide (which see, under slide).—Mitral valve, a valve formed by two triangular folds of the endocardium, or inner lining of the heart, situated at the opening between the left ventricle and the auricle, and serving to prevent regurgitation of blood into the latter cavity. Also bicuspid valve. See cut under heart.—Oral valves. See oral.—Oscillating valve, a cylindrical or conical steam-valve which revolves through less than a complete revolution in opening and closing. It is frequently used with oscillating steam-engines.—Overpressure-valve. See overpressure.—Pocketed valve, a valve fitting into a depression or pocket.—Pot-lid valve. (a) A cap-formed valve which shuts down like a cover upon a port or the end of a pipe. (b) The cover of the air-pump of a steam-engine. E. H. Knight.—Pulmonary, pulmonic valves. See heart.—Pyloric valve. (a) A small tubercle situated at the anterior angle of the trigonum of the bladder. (b) Any formation serving to obstruct or close the pyloric orifice of the stomach. A pylorus may have a valvular construction, or a muscular sphincter may surround the orifice. See pylorus, 2 (b).—Regulator-valve, a throttle-valve.—Reverse valve, in boilers, a valve opening inward to the pressure of the atmosphere when there is a pressure in the boiler less than that which prevails outside.—Rotary valve. See rotary.—Semilunar aortic valve, semilunar pulmonary valve. See semilunar, and cut under heart.—Semilunar valve of the brain. Same as valve of Vieussens.—Sigmoid valve. See sigmoid.—Spiral valve. See spiral.—Steam-thrown valve, in a steam-engine or steam-pump, a valve moved by direct steam-pressure, without the intervention of an eccentric, crank, cam, or valve-stem. See cut under rock-drill.—Thebesian valve. See Thebesian.—Tricuspid valve. See tricuspid.—Twin valve. See twin[1].—Undershut valve, a valve placed beneath the sole-plate of a pump or other mechanism, as distinguished from one placed above the plate, and closed by a force acting from below upward. E. H. Knight.—Valve of Amussat. Same as Heister's valve.—Valve of Bauhin. Same as ileocæcal valve.—Valve of Hasner. See Hasner's valve.—Valve of Tarinus. Same as valve of Vieussens.—Valve of Thebesius. See Thebesian valve.—Valve of Tulpius. Same as ileocæcal valve.—Valve of Varolius. Same as ileocæcal valve.—Valve of Vieussens the delicate transparent roof of the anterior part of the fourth ventricle, continuous anteriorly with the postoptici, posteriorly with the cerebellum; the superior medullary velum.—Valves of Kerkring, the valvulæ conniventes of the intestine (which see, under valvula).—Valves of the heart. See coronary, mitral, semilunar (aortic, pulmonary), Thebesian, and tricuspid valve; also cut under heart.—Valves of the lymphatics. See lymphatic, n. (with cut).—Valves of the veins, folds of the lining membrane of the veins, most numerous in those of the lower extremities, which serve to impede or prevent the backward flow of blood in those vessels.

Valves of a Brachiopod (Leptæna). A, both valves, seen edgewise, showing hinge-area (V, ventral valve); B, dorsal valve, interior.

valve-bucket (valv′buk″et), n. A bucket fitted with a valve; specifically, a pump-bucket or sucker.

valve-chamber (valv′chām″bėr), n. The chamber in which a pump-valve or a steam-valve operates. See cuts under rock-drill, slide-valve, and steam-hammer.

valve-cock (valv′kok), n. A form of cock or faucet which is closed by the dropping of a valve on its seat. E. H. Knight.

valve-coupling (valv′kup″ling), n. A pipe-coupling containing a valve.

valved (valvd), a. [< valve + -ed[2].] Having a valve or valves, in any sense; valvate; valvular.

valve-file (valv′fīl), n. A machinists' file having two acute and two obtuse angles, used in finishing valves, splines, feathers, key-ways, etc. E. H. Knight.

★valve-gear (valv′gēr), n. Mechanism employed in operating a valve or valves.

valveless (valv′les), a. [< valve + -less.] Having no valve.

valvelet (valv′let), n. [< valve + -let.] A little valve; a valvule.

valve-motion (valv′mō″shọn), n. Same as valve-gear.

valve-pallet (valv′pal″et), n. Same as pallet[2], 5.

valve-seat (valv′sēt), n. In mach., the surface upon which a valve rests.

★valve-stem (valv′stem), n. A rod like a piston-rod by which a valve is moved. See cuts under slide-valve, steam-engine, and passenger-engine.

valve-tailed (valv′tāld), a. Noting a Brazilian bat, Diclidurus albus, the end of whose tail occupies a valve-like formation of the interfemoral membrane.

valve-view (valv′vū), n. and a. I. n. In bot., the valval aspect of a diatom. Also called side-view. See valval.

II. a. Noting a position in which a valve-view is presented; valval.

valviferous (val-vif′ẹ-rus), a. [< L. valva, valve, + ferre = E. bear[1].] Bearing a valve; provided with a valve or valvular parts.

valviform (val′vi-fôrm), a. [< L. valva, the leaf of a door (see valve), + forma, form.] Forming or acting as a valve; valvular; valvate. Also ★valvæform.

★valvula (val′vū-lą), n.; pl. valvulæ (-lē). [NL.: see valvule.] In anat., same as valve.—Valvula Bauhini, the ileocæcal valve.—Valvulæ conniventes, transverse folds of the mucous membrane and underlying tissues found throughout a large extent of the small intestine. Their use is probably to retard somewhat the passage of the alimentary mass, and at the same time to offer a greater surface for absorption.—Valvula Heisteri, folds of the mucous membrane, in the neck of the gall-bladder and in the cystic duct, which present the appearance of a spiral valve. See cut under stomach.—Valvula Vieussensii, the valve of Vieussens (which see, under valve).

valvular (val′vū-lär), a. [< valvule + -ar[3].] Of or pertaining to a valve or valvula; also, having the character of a valve; valviform.—Valvular disease, disease of one or more of the valves of the heart.—Valvular sinus. See sinus.

valvule (val′vūl), n. [< F. valvule; < L. valvola, valvula, dim. of valva, the leaf of a door, etc.: see valve.] 1. A little valve. Specifically—(a) In anat.: (1) The valvula or valve of Vieussens. (2) One of the valvulæ conniventes. (b) In bot., a name formerly given to the inner or flowering glumes of grasses. (c) In entom., a corneous piece at the base of the haustellum of sucking insects, corresponding to the labrum in the mandibulate mouth. Kirby and Spence.—Interventricular valvules. See interventricular.

valvulitis (val-vū-lī′tis), n. [NL., < valvula + -itis.] Inflammation of the tissues forming a valve, usually one of the valves of the heart.

vambrace (vam′brās), n. [Also vantbrace, vantbras, vauntbrace; abbr. < F. avant-bras, < avant, before, in front, + bras, arm: see van[2], avant, and brace[1].] The piece of armor which protects the forearm from the elbow-joint to the wrist, whether covering the outer part of the arm only and worn over the sleeve of mail (compare garde-bras and brassart), or inclosing the whole forearm in a cylinder of iron. See cut under rerebrace.

vambraced (vam′brāst), a. [< vambrace + -ed[2].] Incased in armor: said of an arm, especially when used in heraldry as a bearing. Also umbraced.

vamose (va-mōs′), v. i. and t.; pret. and pp. vamosed, ppr. vamosing. [< Sp. vamos, 1st pers. pl. pres. ind. (acting as 1st and 2d pl. impv.), used with inf. ir, go; < L. vadimus, 1st pers. pl. ind. of vadere, go, = E. wade: see wade.] To be off; be gone; decamp from. [Slang.]

> Paul had no such visions; he did not see human lives as pictures, as tableaux-vivants. He was sincerely sorry that Hollis had vamosed in that way.
>
> C. F. Woolson, Jupiter Lights, xxxi.

The inclination to adopt Spanish or Mexican terms, or terms derived from them, is shown also in vamosing, disappearing or running away. N. and Q., 6th ser., X. 428.

To vamose the ranch, to clear out; decamp. [Slang, U. S.]

> My precious partners had vamosed the ranch.
> The Century, XVII. 82.

vamp[1] (vamp), n. [< ME. *vampe, vaumpe, vampay, vampies (also wampe, wampay), earlier vampett, vaumpet (in pl. vaumpez), vauntpe, < OF. vantpie, aphetic form of avant-pied, F. avant-pied, the forepart of the foot, < avant, before, + pied, foot: see van[2] and foot.] 1. That part of the upper leather of a boot or shoe which is in front of the seam at the ankle. See cut under boot.

As a cobbler sews a vamp up.
R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, xlviii.

2. Any piece or patch intended to give an old thing a new appearance; a piece added for appearance' sake. See the verb.—3†. A protection formerly worn for the ankle and leg, and perhaps for the foot also. It seems to have been in most cases a sort of gaiter or spatterdash.—4. In music, an improvised accompaniment.

vamp[1] (vamp), v. [ME. vampayen; < vamp[1], n.] I. trans. 1. To furnish with a new vamp or upper leather, as a shoe or boot.

Item, j. payre of blake hosyn, vampayed with lether.
Paston Letters, I. 476.

What a time did we endure
In two-penny commons, and in boots twice vamp'd!
Middleton, Massinger, and Rowley, Old Law, ii. 1.

2. To repair; furbish up; give an appearance of newness to.

I'le drill you how to giue the lie, stab in the punto, if you dare not fight, then how to vamp a rotten quarrel without ado. Dekker and Ford, Sun's Darling, ii.

A new play, or an old one new vamped, by Shadwell, called "The Royall Shepherdesse"; but the silliest for words and design, and everything, that ever I saw in my whole life. Pepys, Diary, IV. 109.

A pert vamping chaise-undertaker, stepping nimbly across the street, demanded if monsieur would have his chaise refitted. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, vii. 29.

3. In music, to improvise an accompaniment to. [Colloq.]

As soon as I could get in to vamp the tunes on the banjo a little, I went at it too.
Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, III. 191.

To vamp up, to hatch up; make up or put together out of odds and ends, or out of nothing.

I sat myself down and vamped up a fine flaunting poetical panegyric. Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, xxx.

The "Half-Pay Officer," a vamped-up farce, by Molloy.
Doran, Annals of the Stage, I. xvii.

II. intrans. To improvise musical accompaniments. [Colloq.]

vamp[2]† (vamp), v. i. [Origin obscure.] To travel; proceed; move forward.

How much of my life has been trifled away in beaten tracks, where I vamped on with others, only to follow those that went before us. Locke, To A. Collins, Oct. 29, 1703.

vampay†, n. Same as vamp[1], n., 3.

vamper[1] (vam'pėr), n. [< vamp[1] + -er[1].] 1. One who vamps; a cobbler; one who pieces an old thing with something new.—2. One who improvises musical accompaniments. [Colloq.] N. and Q., 7th ser., II. 180.

vamper[2] (vam'pėr), v. i. [Appar. a var. or corruption of vapor.] To make an ostentatious appearance. Jamieson. [Local, Scotch.]

vamper-up (vam'pėr-up'), n. A vamper.

But so also was Shakespeare a vamper-up of old stories.
Edinburgh Rev., CXLV. 452.

vampire (vam'pīr), n. and a. [Formerly also vampyre; < F. vampire = Sp. Pg. vampiro = D. vampier = G. vampyr = Sw. Dan. vampyr (NL. vampyrus), < Serv. vampir = Bulg. vampir, vapir, vepir, vupir = Pol. wampir, also upior = Little Russ. vampyr, vepyr, vopyr, opyr, upyr, opir, uper = White Russ. upir = Russ. vampirŭ, also upirĭ, upyrĭ, obyrĭ (the Pol. wampir, Russ. vampirŭ, appar. < Serv.), a vampire; cf. North Turk. uber, a witch.] I. n. 1. A kind of spectral being or ghost still possessing a human body, which, according to a superstition existing among the Slavic and other races on the lower Danube, leaves the grave during the night, and maintains a semblance of life by sucking the warm blood of living men and women while they are asleep. Dead wizards, werwolves, heretics, and other outcasts become vampires, as do also the illegitimate offspring of parents themselves illegitimate, and any one killed by a vampire. On the discovery of a vampire's grave, the body, which, it is supposed, will be found all fresh and ruddy, must be disinterred, thrust through with a whitethorn stake, and burned in order to render it harmless.

2. Hence, a person who preys on others; an extortioner or blood-sucker.—3. Same as vampire-bat.—4. Theat., a small trap made of two flaps held together by a spring, used for sudden appearances and disappearances of one person.—False vampire, a leaf-nosed bat of South America, erroneously supposed to suck blood. See vampire-bat (b) (1), and cut under Vampyri.—Spectacled vampire. Same as spectacled stenoderm (which see, under stenoderm).

II. a. Of or pertaining to a vampire; resembling a vampire in character; blood-sucking; extortionate; vampiric.

The strong but disinterested wish to co-operate in restoring this noble University to its natural pre-eminence by relieving it from the vampire oppression under which it has pined so long in almost lifeless exhaustion.
Sir W. Hamilton, Discussions, p. 446.

vampire-bat (vam'pīr-bat), n. One of several different species of bats. (a) One of various large frugivorous bats of Africa, Asia, and the Malay archipelago, commonly called flying-foxes, such as the species of Pteropus, Harpyia, etc. The name appears to be due to some superstition, or to a fancied resemblance of these creatures to the spectral beings denominated vampires. (b) One of various bats of South America, of the insectivorous division of the order Chiroptera, only a few of which are noted for sucking blood. (1) There are numerous species of several genera of the family Phyllostomatidæ, among them the Phyllostoma spectrum, popularly known as the vampire-bat, some two feet in expanse of wing. But this species, like most others of the family, is perfectly harmless. (2) The bats which actually suck blood belong to the genera Desmodus and Diphylla, for which a special group named Hæmatophilina or Desmodontes has been formed, and which are also sometimes separated as a family, Desmodidæ. These have a small bifid foliaceous appendage on the nose; the tail and interfemoral membrane are little developed. Their peculiar characteristics are two large projecting upper incisors and two lancet-shaped superior canine teeth, all sharp-pointed, and so arranged as to make a triple puncture like that of the leech; a tongue capable of considerable extension, and furnished at its extremity with a number of papillæ arranged so as to form an organ of suction; and an intestine relatively shorter than in any other mammal. Altogether their structure points them out as designed to live on blood alone. They attack horses and cattle, and sometimes even man in his sleep. Also vampire and vampyre. See cuts under Desmodontes.

vampiric (vam-pir'ik), a. [< vampire + -ic.] Having the character of a vampire; pertaining to vampires or the belief in them: as, vampiric habits, literature, or superstition.

vampirism (vam'pīr-izm), n. [= F. vampirisme; as vampire + -ism.] 1. Belief in the existence of vampires. See vampire, 1.

Vampirism prevails all over Russia, Persia, Greece, Bohemia, and Poland, but especially in the Danubian Principalities. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII. 754.

2. The action of a vampire-bat; the act or practice of blood-sucking.—3. Figuratively, the practice of extortion or preying on others. Carlyle, French Rev., II. iii. 2.

vamplate (vam'plāt), n. [Formerly also vamplet; < F. avant-plat, 'fore-plate,' < avant, before, in front, + plat, plate: see plate.] 1. The plate of iron carried upon the lance, the lance passing through it. It served as a protection for the hand when the lance was couched. It was originally a roundel, but in the armor of the just attained very large dimensions. Also avantplat, lance-plate.

Vamplate of Lance of the end of the 14th century. (From Viollet-le-Duc's "Dict. du Mobilier français.")

Amphialus was run through the vamplate, and under the arm, so as, the staff appearing behind him, it seemed to the beholders he had been in danger.
Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, iii.

2. In her., a bearing representing a gauntlet. Berry. The name vamplate, applied to this bearing, is a mistake arising at a time when medieval armor was not understood.

vamplet† (vam'plet), n. An old form of vamplate.

vampy†, n. Same as vamp[1], n., 3.

vampyre†, n. See vampire.

Vampyri (vam'pi-rī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of vampyrus: see vampire.] A group of typical phyllostomine bats (subfamily Phyllostomatinæ of the family Phyllostomatidæ) confined to the New World. They have a well-developed nose-leaf, more or less horseshoe-shaped in front and lanceolate behind, large interfemoral membrane, long narrow snout, incisors $\frac{2}{2}$ or $\frac{4}{2}$, and premolars $\frac{2}{2}$ or $\frac{3}{2}$. Though called vampires, these bats are not the true blood-suckers, but include numerous insectivorous and frugivorous species, referable to several genera. See vampire-bat (b), and compare Desmodontes.

False Vampire (Phyllostoma spectrum), one of the Vampyri.

Vampyridæ† (vam-pir'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Bonaparte, 1837), < Vampyrus + -idæ.] A family of bats supposed to be vampires; the Vampyri.

Vampyrus (vam'pi-rus), n. [NL. (Leach): see vampire.] The name-giving genus of phyllostomine bats of the group Vampyri (where see cut): inexactly synonymous with Phyllostoma.

vamure†, n. Same as vantmure.

van[1] (van), n. [< OF. van, F. van, a fan, OF. vanne, a bird's wing, < L. vannus, a fan: see fan.] 1. A fan or other contrivance for winnowing grain.

Van. . . . A Vanne, or winnowing Siue. Cotgrave.

The other token of their ignorance of the sea was that they should not know an oar, but call it a corn-van.
Broome, Notes on the Odyssey, xi. 152.

2. [< van[1], v.] In mining, a test of the value of an ore, made by washing (vanning) a small quantity, after powdering it, on the point of a shovel. Vanning is to a Cornish miner what washing in the horn spoon is to the Mexican. See van[1], v., 2.

"If you could only get that motion into a machine," said a gentleman, as he watched the process of making a van on a shovel, and saw the copper roll up to the highest point, "it would beat the world for slime-dressing."
F. G. Coggin, Trans. Am. Inst. Min. Eng., XII. 64.

3. A vane, as of a feather; hence, a wing.

His vans no longer could his flight sustain.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., xii. 750.

As bats at the wired windows of a dairy,
They beat their vans.
Shelley, Witch of Atlas, xvi.

★van[1] (van), v. t.; pret. and pp. vanned, ppr. vanning. [< F. vanner, < L. vannere, fan, winnow, < vannus, a fan: see van[1], n., and cf. fan, v.] 1†. To winnow; fan.

Vanner. To vanne or winnow. Cotgrave.

The winnowing, vanning, and laying . . . up of corne.
Holland, tr. of Pliny, xviii. 32.

2. In mining, to separate, as ore from veinstone, by washing it on the point of a shovel. See van, n., 2, and vanner.

van[2] (van), n. [Abbr. of vanguard (due to association of vanguard and rearguard, whence van, supposed to be related to vanguard as rear to rearguard).] 1. The foremost division of an army on the march, or of a fleet when sailing; hence, by extension, the front of an army when in line of battle: opposed to rear.

The foe he had surveyed,
Ranged, as to him they did appear,
With van, main-battle, wings, and rear.
S. Butler, Hudibras, I. ii. 104.

We too can boast of no ignoble spoils;
But those my ship contains; whence distant far,
I fight conspicuous in the van of war.
Pope, Iliad, xiii. 350.

2. The leaders of any movement in which many are engaged; the foremost individuals of any moving body; the front of any advancing body; the front generally: literally or figuratively.

Sir Roger, you shall have the van and lead the way.
Beau. and Fl., Scornful Lady, v.

Come, firm Resolve, take thou the van.
Burns, To Dr. Blacklock.

Doc. Meggar, too, leading the van, sends back over his shoulder the Parthian arrow of a single oath.
W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 200.

★van[3] (van), n. [Abbr. of caravan, regarded perhaps as carry-van* (cf. cariole, taken as carryall): see caravan.] 1. Any large covered carriage; specifically, a large covered wagon used in moving furniture and household effects.—2. A kind of vehicle, sometimes covered and sometimes open, used by tradesmen and others for carrying light goods, etc.—3. A close carriage attached to a railway-train, for carrying passengers' luggage, for the accommodation of the guard, etc. [Great Britain.]

van[3] (van), v. t. [< van[3], n.] To carry or transport in a van.

van-. A shortened form of avant-.

vanadate (van'a-dāt), n. [< vanad(ic) + -ate[1].] A salt of vanadic acid.

vanadiate (vā-nā'di-āt), n. [< vanadium + -ate[1].] Same as vanadate.

vanadic (vā-nad'ik), a. [< vanadium + -ic.] 1. Related to or containing vanadium.—2. Containing vanadium with its maximum valence.—Vanadic acid, H_3VO_4, a vanadium acid, analogous to phosphoric acid, not known in the free state, but forming well-defined salts.

vanadiferous (van-a-dif'e-rus), a. [< NL. vanadium, q. v., + L. ferre = E. bear[1].] In chem., containing or yielding vanadium.

vanadinite (van'a-din-īt), n. [< vanad(ate) + -in-ite.] A mineral consisting of lead vanadate with lead chlorid. It occurs in hexagonal crystals of yellow, brown, or red color; it is isomorphous with apatite (calcium phosphate), pyromorphite (lead phosphate), and mimetite (lead arseniate).

★vanadious (vā-nā'di-us), a. [< vanadium + -ous.] Containing vanadium with a lower apparent valence than it exhibits in vanadic compounds.

vanadite (van'a-dīt), n. [< vanad(ous) + -ite[2].] ★A salt of vanadous acid (but it does not exist).

vanadium (vā-nā'di-um), n. [See def.] Chemical symbol, V; atomic weight, 51.2. A metal first discovered by Del Rio, in 1801, in a lead ore from Mexico, and called by him erythronium, because its salts became red when heated with acids. This supposed new metal was not accepted by chemists, and Del Rio's name was dropped. Later, in 1830, Sefström described a new metal from Taberg, in Sweden, for which he proposed the name of vanadium (from Vanadis, one of the goddesses of the Scandinavian mythology); and immediately after it was shown by Wöhler that Del Rio's ore was, in fact, a vanadate of lead. But the name vanadium has been maintained, and that of erythronium has never been received. Metallic vanadium, as prepared by reducing the chlorid in hydrogen gas, is a light-gray powder, which under the microscope has a brilliant silvery luster: it has a specific gravity of 5.5; it is very little acted on by air or moisture at the ordinary temperature; it is easily dissolved in nitric acid, but is not at all acted on by hydrochloric acid, and is affected by strong sulphuric acid only when heated. Vanadium belongs to the antimony group, and, like the other members of this group, is in its chemical relations closely connected with the elements of the nitrogen group. Vanadium is an element whose combinations seem to be quite widely distributed, although occurring only in small quantity. The most abundant vanadium mineral is vanadinite, which is a vanadate of lead with chlorid of lead, and has been found in numerous widely separated localities. Vanadium resembles titanium in that it has been detected in various clays and igneous rocks. It is obtained in some quantity from the cupriferous Triassic beds of the vicinity of Mottram, Cheshire, England, in the form of the so-called mottramite, a hydrous vanadate of copper and lead.—Vanadium bronze, a fine yellow pigment employed in the place of gold bronze. It is meta-vanadic acid, HVO_3.

vanadous (van'a-dus), a. [< vanad(ium) + -ous.] Of or pertaining to vanadium: as, vanadous oxid: specifically noting compounds in which vanadium has a lower valence than in the vanadic compounds.

van-courier† (van'kö͝r'i-ėr), n. [Early mod. E. also vant-courier; abbr. of avant-courier.] An avant-courier; one sent before; a precursor; a forerunner. Bailey, 1731.

I'll send then my vant-courier presently; in the mean time march after the captain, scoundrels!
Dekker and Webster, Northward Ho, ii. 1.

Vancouveria (van-kö͝-vē'ri-ä), n. [NL. (Morren and Decaisne, 1834), named after Captain Vancouver, an English navigator, who visited the western coast of America 1792–4.] A genus of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants, of the family Berberidaceæ. It is characterized by twelve to fifteen sepals, six shorter nectary-like petals and as many stamens, and a capsule opening into two valves. The original species, V. hexandra, is a perennial herb growing from a creeping rootstock, native of shady woodlands near the Pacific coast from northern California to Vancouver Island. It bears dissected radical leaves, and a panicled raceme of white flowers on a leafless scape. It has been called American barrenwort, from its close resemblance to the European Epimedium alpinum, which has the repute of possessing sterilizing powers. (See barrenwort.) A second species occurs in California from Santa Cruz northward.

Vanda (van'dä), n. [NL. (Jones, 1795), said to be < Skt. vandana, a parasite.] 1. A genus of epiphytic orchids, of the tribe Vandeæ and subtribe Sarcantheæ. It is characterized by unbranched loose racemes of rather large flowers with very flat and spreading fleshy sepals and petals, all usually nearly alike and contracted below; a lip with a saccate base; broad pollen-stalks; and an unappendaged column. There are about 20 species, natives of India and the Malayan archipelago, with one, V. Hindsii, in tropical Australia. They bear spreading, flat, two-ranked leaves, commonly fleshy or coriaceous, and often notched at the apex—in one species, V. teres, cylindrical, and resembling a goose-quill. The handsome short-pedicelled flowers are borne on a lateral peduncle. Many species are in cultivation under glass, and from their size, fragrance, beautiful colors, and ornamental markings, are among the most highly prized of orchids, a single plant of a rare species having brought $2,000. They are grown on suspended blocks of wood or cork, and produce several, sometimes forty, flowers on a plant at once. V. teres, the cylinder-leafed vanda, a native of Sylhet, in India, bears blood-red white-bordered flowers 4 inches broad. V. cærulea, which has equally large bright-blue flowers, grows on the oak and banian in India; this and V. cærulescens, with numerous smaller pale-blue flowers, are unusual in color among orchids. V. insignis and V. suavis are favorites in cultivation for their fragrance; V. tricolor, for its violet, white, and yellow flowers. V. furva, sometimes called the cowslip-scented orchid, bears brownish, rose, and copper-colored flowers; and several species are cinnamon-colored.

2. [l. c.] A plant of this genus.

Vandal (van'dal), n. and a. [= F. Vandale = Sp. Vándalo = Pg. Vandalo = G. Vandale = D. Wandel = Sw. Dan. Vandal, < LL. Vandali, also Vinduli, Vindili, Vandals, Vandalus, adj., Vandal; from the Teut. name seen in D. Wenden = Icel. Vindir, the Wends: see Wend[2].] I. n. 1. One of a Germanic race who first appeared in middle and southern Germany, and in the first half of the fifth century ravaged Gaul, Spain, northern Africa, etc., and in 455 Rome itself, with enormous damage to accumulated treasures of art and literature. Hence—2. [l. c.] One who wilfully or ignorantly destroys or disfigures any work of art, literature, or the like; one who is hostile to or wantonly attacks anything that is beautiful or venerable.

II. a. [l. c.] Of or pertaining to a vandal or vandalism.

Bestrewn with vandal initials cut in the soft material.
Athenæum, No. 3067, p. 182.

Vandalic (van-dal'ik), a. [< Vandal + -ic.] 1. Pertaining to or characteristic of the Vandals. Hence—2. [l. c.] Ferocious; rude; barbarous; specifically, hostile to art; destructive of what is beautiful or admirable.

Rash divines might be apt to charge this holy man . . . with more than Vandalic rage against human learning.
Warburton, Doctrine of Grace, iii. 2.

Barbarians of the Vandalic race.
Kingsley, Hypatia, xxxi.

Vandalism (van'dal-izm), n. [= F. vandalisme; < Vandal + -ism.] 1. The conduct of Vandals. Hence—2. [l. c.] Wilful or ignorant destruction of artistic or literary treasures; hostility to or irreverence or contempt for what is beautiful or venerable.

Vandeæ (van'dē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1833), < Vanda + -eæ.] A tribe of orchids, characterized by a single posterior opercular anther, its cells almost always confluent at maturity, and closely incumbent above a horizontal rostellum, to which the waxy pollen-masses are affixed by a small thick or scale-like gland, which is often prolonged into a distinct caudicle or stalk. It includes about 140 genera, classed in 8 subtribes, the types of which are the genera Eulophia, Cymbidium, Cyrtopodium, Stanhopea, Maxillaria, Oncidium, Sarcanthus, and Notylia. These genera alone include over 530 tropical species, and are all, except perhaps the first and last, highly prized in cultivation. The Notylieæ (or Podochileæ) are aberrant in their erect rostellum, and are thus transitional to the tribe Neotticeæ. The two globose or oblong pollen-masses, each sometimes bisected, are very readily removed by insect or artificial aid, and insure cross-fertilization. The genera are nearly all epiphytic. They often produce pseudo-bulbs, but not tubers; their stems are erect, or reduced to a creeping rootstock adhering to trees or stones; their inflorescence is usually lateral, very rarely, as in Cyrtopodium, a terminal raceme. The flowers are commonly large and handsome, many of the most valuable among orchids belonging here, as Aërides, Gynizodon, Saccolabium, Odontoglossum, Phalænopsis, Zygopetalum, Lycaste, Catasetum, and Peristeria. See cut under Phalænopsis.

Vandellia (van-del'i-ä), n. [NL., named after the Italian Vandelli, who wrote in 1788 on Portuguese and Brazilian plants.] A name given by Linnæus in 1767 to Lindernia, a genus of plants, of the family Scrophulariaceæ. It is distinguished from the related genus Ilysanthes by its four perfect stamens. There are about twenty-six species, natives of warm parts of the old world, two species, Lindernia crustacea and L. diffusa, occurring in tropical America. They are usually much-branched annuals, with opposite leaves, and small flowers which are solitary in the axils, or form a terminal raceme or umbel. See bitter-blain.

vandoo (van'dö), n. A dialectal variant of vendue.

Vandyke (van-dīk'), n. and a. [Short for Vandyke collar, so called from Vandyke (Anthony Van Dyck, 1599–1641), a Flemish painter.] I. n. 1. One of a series of relatively large points forming an edge or border, as of lace, ribbon, cloth, etc.

An immense straw bonnet, tied down with satin ribbons, exhibiting two bows, the edges of which were cut in vandykes.
J. Moore, The Post-Captain, xiv.

In a cairn which had previously been disturbed was a drinking cup ornamented with vandykes.
Athenæum, No. 3288, p. 590.

2. A Vandyke cape or collar. See II.—3. A painting by Vandyke.—4. A small cape resembling a very broad collar, worn by women and girls in the first quarter of the nineteenth century.

II. a. Pertaining to the style of dress represented in portraits by Vandyke; especially, ornamented with relatively large points forming a border: noting a broad collar or cape, as of linen.

It is to such considerations as these, together with his Vandyke dress, his handsome face, and his peaked beard, that he [Charles I.] owes, we verily believe, most of his popularity with the present generation.
Macaulay, Milton.

Vandyke beard, a pointed beard.—Vandyke brown. See brown.

vandyke (van-dīk'), v. t.; pret. and pp. vandyked, ppr. vandyking. [< Vandyke, n.] To cut the edge of, as a piece of dress, in points, after the manner of a Vandyke collar.

vane (vān), n. [< ME. vane, a var. of fane, < AS. fana, a flag, banner: see fane[1].] 1†. A flag or pennon.—2. A weathercock; a device which is moved by the wind in such a manner as to show the wind's direction; a weather-vane.

Vane.—From the Hôtel Dieu, Beaune, France, 1441. (From Viollet-le-Duc's "Dict. de l'Arch.")

O stormy peple! vnsad and euer vntrewe!
Ay vndiscreet and chaunging as a vane.
Chaucer, Clerk's Tale, l. 940.

A vane blown with all winds. Shak., Much Ado, iii. 1. 66.

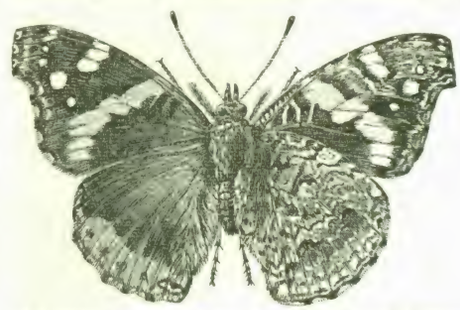
3. A device used on shipboard to answer the purpose of a weathercock: generally called dog-vane. It is usually a long slender cone of bunting, which is hoisted at the masthead and blows in the wind, pointing away from the quarter from which the wind comes.

4. A device similar to a weather-vane, attached to an axis, and having a surface exposed to a moving current, as in an anemometer or a water-meter.—5. In ornith., the web of a feather on either side of the shaft; the pogonium; the vexillum. Also used of an arrow. See feather, and cuts under aftershaft and penciling.

The arrows having the broader vanes will fall shorter than those having the narrower ones.
M. and W. Thompson, Archery, p. 33.



6. One of the plates or blades of a windmill, a screw propeller, and the like. See cuts under screw propeller (under screw), and smoke-jack.—7. In surveying-instruments: (a) A horizontal piece of wood or metal slipping on a leveling-staff. It is raised or lowered to any point of the staff to indicate the plane of apparent level at which it is cut by the axis of the telescope. See leveling-staff. Also called target. (b) The sight of a quadrant or similar instrument for the measurement of angles, marking the direction from the eye to the object.

vaned (vānd), a. [< vane + -ed[2].] Furnished with a vane or vanes.

vaneless (vān'les), a. Having no vane: as, a vaneless windmill.

Vanellus (vä-nel'us), n. [NL. (Brisson, 1760), after F. vanneau, lapwing, so called with ref. to the sound made by its wings; < ML. vanellus, vannellus, dim. of L. vannus, a fan: see van[1].] A genus of plover-like grallatorial birds, of the family Charadriidæ, having four toes, a long recurved occipital crest, lustrous plumage, and no spur on the wing; the true lapwings. It includes the well-known pewit or lapwing of Europe, V. cristatus, and a few similar species. See cuts under lapwing, plover (egg), and Pressirostres.

Vanessa (vä-nes'ä), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1808), said to be intended for Phanessa*, < Gr. Φάνης, a mystic divinity in the Orphic system.] 1. A notable genus of butterflies, used variously by different authors, but now generally restricted to a few forms, of which the cosmopolitan V. atalanta is the type. Of the few known in England, V. atalanta is the red admiral; V. io is the peacock; V. cardui is the painted-lady or thistle-butterfly. V.

huntera is a common species in the northern United States, having a transcontinental range. The comma-butterfly is sometimes placed in this genus. See also cut under painted-lady.

2. [l. c.] A butterfly of this genus.

Vanessinæ (van-e-sī'nē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Vanessa + -inæ.] A subfamily of Nymphalidæ, named from the genus Vanessa. It includes also the genera Cynthia and Grapta. All the species are sometimes called anglewings.

vanessoid (vā-nes'oid), a. and n. I. a. Resembling or related to a butterfly of the genus Vanessa; belonging to the Vanessinæ.

II. n. A butterfly of this group.

van-foss (van'fos), n. [⟨ F. avant-fosse, ⟨ avant, before, + fosse, ditch, trench: see *foss*².] In fort., a ditch on the outside of the counterscarp.

vang (vang), n. [⟨ D. vang, a catch, a curb (⟨ vangen, catch), = E. fang: see fang.] A guy extending from the end of a gaff to the ship's rail on each side, and serving to steady the gaff.

Vanga (vang'gä), n. [NL. (Vieillot, 1816), ⟨ L. vanga, a mattock.] 1. A genus of shrike-like birds of Madagascar. The name was applied by Lesson in 1831 to the African shrikes often called Malaconotus, and by Swainson in 1837 to certain shrike-like birds of Australia. It has lately been adopted by G. R. Gray in its original acceptation. As originally or very early used by Buffon, and as generically retained by Cuvier, it applied especially to Lanius curvirostris (Gmelin) of Madagascar.

2. [l. c.] A shrike of the genus Vanga; the hook-billed shrike, V. curvirostris, or the rufous shrike, V. rufa—both of Madagascar.

vanga-shrike (vang'gä-shrīk), n. A vanga.

vangee (van'jē), n. [Origin not ascertained.] A contrivance for working the pumps of a ship by means of a barrel and crank-brakes.

vanglo, vangloe (vang'glō), n. [W. Ind.] Sesame or til. [West Indies.]

vanguard (van'gärd), n. [Formerly vantgard; by apheresis from avantgarde, ⟨ F. avant-garde, ⟨ avant, before, + garde, guard: see guard.] A detachment of an army whose duty it is to guard against surprise from the front and to clear the way; the van. Compare *van*².

The Earls of Hereford and Norfolk, with the Earl of Lincoln, led his [Edward I.'s] Van-guard at the famous Battle of Fonkirk. Baker, Chronicles, p. 97.

I see (as vice-Roy of their brutish Band)
The Elephant the Vant-gard doth command.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 6.

In the vant-guard he sat bravely mounted.
Beau. and Fl., Love's Cure, i. 1.

This is the vanguard of the hordes of Attila, the concession made in the regular army to legend and fancy.
Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 844.

vanguard†, v. t. [⟨ vanguard, n.] To stand as a guard before.

Carthage is strong, with many a mightie tower,
With broad deepe ditch, vant-guarding stately wall.
T. C. C. J., Remedy of Love, l. 83. (Nares.)

vanilla (vā-nil'ä), n. [= F. vanille, ⟨ NL. vanilla, ⟨ Sp. vainilla, formerly vaynilla, the pod or bean of the vanilla-plant, hence also the plant itself (also applied to heliotrope), lit. 'little pod,' dim. of vaina, scabbard, sheath, pod, ⟨ L. vagina, sheath: see vagina.] 1. A plant of the genus Vanilla (see def. 3), especially one of several species yielding the vanilla of commerce.

Flowering Branch of Vanilla planifolia.
a, the fruit.

V. planifolia is by far the largest source; but other species, as V. aromatica and V. Pompona, are also grown for use. Vanilla is most largely produced in Mexico, the product being obtained to a great extent from the wild plant; but the plant is also found, either wild or in cultivation, in various parts of Central and South America, and is more or less grown in many warm countries, notably in Mauritius and the Seychelles, Java, and Tahiti. On the isthmus of Panama the fruit of Selenipedium Chica, and perhaps of some other orchids, there known as vanilla chica, or little vanilla, is used like that of true vanilla. The vanilla-plant is a climber easily propagated by cuttings, beginning to bear when three years old, and continuing thirty or forty years. The flowers need to be artificially fertilized, except in the plant's natural habitat, where fertilization is effected by insects. The fruit is a long fleshy pod, known as vanilla-bean, from its form, not from its seeds, which are minute.

2. The vanilla-bean or its economic extract. The valuable property of the bean, which resides in a volatile oil (see vanillin), is developed by a slow process of curing involving fermentation. The extract has a peculiar agreeable odor and aromatic taste. It has the medicinal property of an aromatic stimulant, with some effect upon the nervous system. Its chief use, however, is in the preparation of liquors, in perfumery, and as a flavoring of chocolate, confectionery, creams, etc.

3. [cap.] [NL. (Plumier, 1703).] A genus of orchids, of the tribe Neottieæ, type of the subtribe Vanilleæ. It is characterized by having tall climbing and branching leafy stems, and large flowers with a broad concave stalked lip, at the base rolled about the column, to which the stalk is adnate. There are about 60 species, widely scattered through the tropics. They are robust climbers, sending out adventitious roots, by which they cling to trees, and bearing thick fleshy or coriaceous leaves. The flowers are usually large, often abundant, and of delicious fragrance, chiefly white and red, in several economic species green. The dark-brown pods are 6 to 9 inches long, and are filled with a dark oily odorous pulp. (See def. 1 and vanilloes.) The Jamaican species are there known as greenwithe and purplelip. V. planifolia occurs also in Florida along the everglades, where its green flowers reach about 2 inches in diameter. V. Pompona and V. Phalænopsis are cultivated under glass for their flowers, which are large and handsome, yellowish, white, or orange.—Frosted vanilla (F. vanille givrée), vanilla-beans upon the surface of which vanillin appears in frost-like crystals: the best quality. A. W. Harrison.—Wild vanilla, a composite plant, Trilisa odoratissima, found from Virginia to Florida and Louisiana. It is a rather tall erect plant with numerous small rose-purple heads in a cymose panicle. The leaves have a persistent vanilla-like fragrance, and are considerably used to improve the odor of tobacco. The root-leaves are much larger than the others, and gain for the plant the name also of deer's-tongue or hound's-tongue.

vanilla-bean (vā-nil'ä-bēn), n. The fruit of the plant vanilla. See vanilla, 1 and 2.

vanilla-grass (vā-nil'ä-gras), n. A grass of the genus Savastana, chiefly S. odorata; holy-grass. The large-leafed vanilla-grass is S. macrophylla of California. See Hierochloë.

vanilla-plant (vā-nil'ä-plant), n. 1. See vanilla, 1 and 3.—2. Same as wild vanilla (which see, under vanilla).

vanillic (vā-nil'ik), a. [⟨ vanill(in) + -ic.] Related to or derived from vanilla.—Vanillic acid, a monobasic crystalline acid obtained by the oxidation of its aldehyde vanillin.

vanillin (vā-nil'in), n. [⟨ vanilla + *-in*².] The neutral odoriferous principle ($C_8H_8O_3$) of vanilla. It forms crystalline needles having a hot, biting taste, soluble in hot water and in alcohol. It is now prepared artificially from coniferin and from oil of cloves, and used as a flavoring extract.

vanillism (vā-nil'izm), n. [⟨ vanilla + -ism.] An affection observed among workers in vanilla, characterized by an itching papular eruption of the skin, irritation of the nasal mucous membrane, headache, vertigo, pains in the muscles, and great prostration. It is supposed to be due to a poisonous action of the vanilla or of the oil of cashew with which the pods are coated.

vanilloes (vā-nil'ōz), n. An inferior kind of vanilla obtained from Vanilla Pompona.

vaniloquence† (vā-nil'ō-kwens), n. [⟨ L. vaniloquentia, ⟨ vaniloquen(t-)s*, vaniloquent: see vaniloquent.] Idle talk; vain babbling. Blount, Glossographia (1670).

vaniloquent† (vā-nil'ō-kwent), a. [⟨ L. vaniloquen(t-)s*, vaniloquent, ⟨ vanus, empty, + loquen(t-)s, ppr. of loqui, speak, talk.] Talking idly or vainly. Bailey, 1727.

vanish (van'ish), v. i. [⟨ ME. vanisshen, vanischen, vaneschen, vanschen, ⟨ OF. vaniss- (stem of certain parts of vanir* = It. vanire, pres. vanisco), ⟨ L. vanescere, disappear, be in vain, ⟨ vanus, empty, vain: see vain.] 1. To disappear quickly; pass from a visible to an invisible state; become imperceptible.

The heavens shall vanish away like smoke. Isa. li. 6.

Of the vanished dream
No image was there left to him.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I. 96.

2. To pass out of view; pass beyond the limit of vision; disappear gradually; fade away.

Now when she [the queen] could no longer detain the Empire from her son, not enduring to survive her glory, she vanisht out of sight. Sandys, Travailes, p. 118.

3. To pass away; be annihilated or lost; be no more.

Pick'd from the worm-holes of long-vanish'd days.
Shak., Hen. V., ii. 4. 86.

Before Atrides' rage so sinks the foe,
Whole squadrons vanish, and proud heads lie low.
Pope, Iliad, xi. 206.

All must feel that by his [Shelley's] subtle sense of beauty he caught many a vanishing hue of earth and sky which no poet before him had noticed.
J. C. Shairp, Aspects of Poetry, p. 151.

4. To rise or be given off, as breath; exhale. [Rare.]

A gentler judgment vanish'd from his lips.
Shak., R. and J., iii. 3. 10.

5. In math., to become zero.—Vanishing circle. See circle.—Vanishing fraction, in alg. See fraction.—Vanishing line, in persp., the line which represents the line at infinity in which any given plane cuts all parallel planes.—Vanishing plane, in relief persp., the plane which represents the plane at infinity, and thus contains all vanishing points and vanishing lines.—Vanishing point, in persp., the point which represents the point at infinity in which an imaginary line passing through the eye of the observer parallel to any straight line of an object to be drawn cuts that line produced and all parallel lines; hence, colloquially and in confusion with sense 5, the point or condition of disappearance of anything.

The margin of profit has been reduced to vanishing-point. Quarterly Rev., CXLV. 72.

Vanishing stress. See *stress*1.

vanish (van'ish), n. [⟨ vanish, v.] In phonetics, a sound with which another principal sound vanishes or ends, as the ē-sound of ā (the i in ei as pronounced in veil), or the ō-sound of ō (the u in ou as pronounced in soul).

vanisher (van'ish-ėr), n. [⟨ vanish + *-er*¹.] One who disappears or vanishes. Whittier.

vanishingly (van'ish-ing-li), adv. In a vanishing manner; so as to vanish; imperceptibly: as, a certain probability is vanishingly small.

vanishment (van'ish-ment), n. [⟨ vanish + -ment.] A vanishing.

Vanist (vā'nist), n. [⟨ Vane (see def.) + -ist.] One of the New England Antinomians, about 1637: so called from Sir Henry Vane, governor of Massachusetts Bay Colony in 1636.

vanitied (van'i-tid), a. [⟨ vanity + *-ed*².] Affected with vanity. [Rare.]

I am exasperated against your foolish, your low-vanitied Lovelace.
Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe, IV. 86. (Davies.)

vanity (van'i-ti), n.; pl. vanities (-tiz). [Early mod. E. vanitye, vanitie; ⟨ ME. vanitee, vanite, ⟨ OF. vanite, vanitet, F. vanité = Pr. vanitat, vanetat = Sp. vanidad = Pg. vaidade = It. vanità, ⟨ L. vanita(t-)s, emptiness, vanity, ⟨ vanus, empty, vain: see vain.] 1. The character or state of being vain. (a) Worthlessness; futility; falsity; unsubstantialness; unrealness; illusion; deception; emptiness; folly; want of substance to satisfy desire; hollowness.

Nothing, God wot, but vanitee in sweven is.
Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 102.

Vanity of vanities, saith the preacher, all is vanity.
Eccles. i. 2.

All was vanity, feeding the wind, and folly.
Sir T. Browne, Urn-burial, v.

(b) The desire of indiscriminate admiration; inflation of mind upon slight ground; empty pride, inspired by an overweening conceit of one's personal attainments or adornments, and making its possessor anxious for the notice and applause of others.

To be fair,
And nothing virtuous, only fits the eye
Of gaudy youth and swelling vanity.
Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess, i. 3.

They were faine to let him goe on till all men saw his vanity. Bradford, Plymouth Plantation, p. 171.

Vanity is the cordial drop which makes the bitter cup of life go down.
J. Adams, in Josiah Quincy's Figures of the Past, p. 78.

(c) Ostentation; ambitious display; pompous vaunting; pride; vainglory.

They . . . through their owne vanitye . . . doe thereupon build and enlarge many forged historyes of theyr owne antiquitye. Spenser, State of Ireland.

When the superior acts out of a principle of vanity, the dependant will be sure to allow it him.
Steele, Tatler, No. 202.

2. That which is vain; anything empty, visionary, or unsubstantial. (a) Empty pleasure; idle show; unsubstantial enjoyment; petty object of pride.

The pomps and vanity of this wicked world.
Book of Common Prayer, Catechism.

They are gilded and adulterate vanities.
Fletcher (and another?), Prophetess, v. 3.

Think not, when woman's transient breath is fled,
That all her vanities at once are dead.
Pope, R. of the L., i. 52.

(b) Fruitless desire or endeavor; effort which produces no result.

It is a vanity to waste our days in the blind pursuit of knowledge. Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, ii. 8.

There, far in the apse, is seen the sad Madonna standing in her folded robe, lifting her hands in vanity of blessing.
Ruskin, Stones of Venice, II. iii. § 39.

(c) An empty or vain conceit; a trifle.

I must Bestow upon the eyes of this young couple
Some vanity of mine art. Shak., Tempest, iv. 1. 41.

In Holy-Oke's edition of Rider's Latin Dictionary, ed. 1633, the word phaeton is not given. May we conclude from this that the phaeton was a vanity started in Puritan times? N. and Q., 6th ser., X. 476.

(d) In the Bible, a heathen deity, as having no proper existence.

Are there any among the vanities of the Gentiles that can cause rain? Jer. xiv. 22.

3†. One of the personified vices in the old moralities and puppet-shows.

You . . . take vanity the puppet's part. Shak., Lear, ii. 2. 39.

Vanity Fair, the world as a scene of vanity or of ostentatious folly; hence, the world of fashion: so called from the fair described in Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress" as established by Beelzebub, Apollyon, and Legion for the sale of all sorts of vanities. The name was adopted by Thackeray as the title of a satirical novel. =Syn. 1. (b) Pride, Egotism, Vanity, etc. See egotism.

vanmure†, n. Same as vantmure.

vanner (van'ėr), n. [< van[1] + -er[1].] In mining, a machine for dressing ore; an ore-separator; a vanning-machine. The name is given to various contrivances patented and attempted to be brought into use for dressing ore, in which the peculiar motions of the shovel in the miner's hands in the operation of "making a van" are, or are supposed to be, more or less successfully imitated. "Berdan's machine" is one of these contrivances, and has been used to some extent in California and elsewhere. The most satisfactory machine of this kind is the so-called "Frue vanner," which is now widely known and somewhat extensively used. In this machine various well-tried methods are combined with a satisfactory result; but it cannot be said to be as close an imitation of the "vanning motion" as Berdan's is. It is, in fact, a combination of the principle of giving side-blows, adopted in Rittinger's "side-blow percussion-table," with that of feeding the ore on an endless traveling belt, slightly inclined in position, on which the ore is subjected to the action of a stream of water. "It has the defect of being able to treat a binary ore only, or at least to furnish only two products." (Callon.) vanner-hawk (van'ėr-hâk), n. The hover-hawk, windhover, or kestrel, Tinnunculus alaudarius. Also called windfanner.

vannet (van'et), n. [< OF. (and F.) vannet, a scallop-shell, dim. of van, a fan: see van[1].] In her., a bearing representing a scallop without the little pointed plates which form the hinge.

vanning-machine (van'ing-ma-shēn″), n. An apparatus for concentrating or cleaning ore, in which the motion of the shovel in vanning is attempted to be imitated; a vanner.

vanquish (vang'kwish), v. t. [< ME. venquishen, venkisen, vencusen, < OF. veinquis-, stem of certain parts of venquir, veinquir (> ME. venken, fenken), also veincre, vaincre, F. vaincre = Pr. vencer, venser = Sp. Pg. vencer = It. vincere, < L. vincere, conquer, vanquish. From the same L. verb are ult. E. victor, victory, convict, convince, evict, evince, vincible, invincible, etc.] 1. To conquer; overcome; especially, to subdue in battle, as an enemy.

For thus sayth Tullius, that ther is a maner garneson that no man may vanquish ne discomfite, and that is a Lord to be beloved of his citizeins, and of his peple. Chaucer, Tale of Melibeus.

Then [while he hung on the cross] was he vanquishing death by his death, and opening for us a gate to life and immortality. Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. xviii.

2. To defeat in any contest, as in argument; get the better of.

He [Garrick] struggled with Quin for mastery—vanquished him, became his friend, and hung up over his grave a glowing testimony to his talent and his virtues. Doran, Annals of the Stage, I. 403.

3. To confute; show to be erroneous or unfounded; overturn.

This bold assertion has been fully vanquished in a late reply to the bishop of Meaux's treatise. Bp. Atterbury.

4. To overpower; prostrate; be too much for.

Sorrow and grief have vanquish'd all my powers. Shak., 2 Hen. VI., ii. 1. 183.

Love of himself ne'er vanquish'd me,
But through your Eyes the Conquest made.
Congreve, Song to Amynta.

5†. To overpower the peculiar virtue or properties of; destroy or render inert; neutralize.

If the dry of fire be vanquished by the moist of water, air will result; if the hot of air be vanquished by the cold of earth, water will result; and if the moist of water be vanquished by the dry of fire, earth will result. H. E. Roscoe.

★vapor, vapour (vā'pọr), n. [< ME. vapour, < OF. vapour, F. vapeur = Sp. Pg. vapor = It. vapore, < L. vapor, OL. vapos, exhalation, steam, vapor, in particular a warm exhalation, warmth, heat, hence ardor; akin to vapidus, that has exhaled its flavor, vapid, vappa, wine that has exhaled its flavor; prob. orig. cvapor*, akin to Gr. καπνός (κϝαπνός*), smoke (L. cvapor* being related to Gr. καπνός, smoke, as L. sopor (svapor*), sleep, is to Gr. ὕπνος (= L. somnus), sleep), καπνεῖν, breathe forth, Lith. kwapas, breath, fragrance, evaporation, kwepti, breathe, smell, kwepalas, perfume, Russ. kopotŭ, fine soot.] 1. An exhalation of moisture; any visible diffused substance, as fog, mist, steam, or smoke, floating in the atmosphere and impairing its transparency; in meteor., the invisible aqueous moisture which pervades the air and adds its weight and pressure to that of the dry air as a part of the total atmospheric pressure. See def. 2.

It may nat be . . . that where greet fyr hath longe tyme endured, that ther ne dwelleth som vapour of warmnesse. Chaucer, Melibeus.

From the damp earth impervious vapours rise. Pope, tr. of Statius's Thebaid, i. 486.

2. In physics, the gaseous form which a solid or liquid substance assumes when sufficiently heated. Vapor is essentially gas, and, since all known gases are unquestionably capable of liquefaction, no physical difference can be said really to exist between an ordinary gas, such as oxygen, and a vapor, such as steam. In common language, however, a difference is usually recognized: a gas is a substance which at ordinary temperatures and pressures exists in the gaseous state, while a vapor is the gaseous form of a substance which normally exists in a solid or liquid form. An important distinction exists between a saturated vapor (one which is on the point of condensation) and a non-saturated vapor (one which can be compressed or cooled to a certain extent without condensation). The latter obeys Boyle's and Gay-Lussac's laws of gases; in the former, however, increased compression produces condensation, but does not change the pressure of the vapor, which is a function of the temperature alone. Superheated steam is a non-saturated vapor. Aqueous vapor is always present as a minor constituent of the atmosphere, and its amount, which is very variable both at different places on the earth's surface and in the same locality at different times, forms an important element of climate. By a reduction of temperature the aqueous vapor in the air is brought to the so-called state of saturation, and then condensed into cloud, mist, and rain. See rain[1].

It would be an error to confound clouds or fog or any visible mist with the vapour of water; this vapour is a perfectly impalpable gas, diffused, even on the clearest days, throughout the atmosphere.
Tyndall, Radiation, § 12.

3†. Effluence; influence.

Man, bryd, best, fissh, herbe, and grene tre,
They fele in tymes, with vapour eterne,
God loveth, and to love wol noght werne.
Chaucer, Troilus, iii. 11.

4†. Wind; flatulence.

For that that causeth gaping . . . or stretching is when the spirits are a little heavy, by any vapour or the like.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 296.

5. In med., a class of remedies, officinal in the British pharmacopœia, which are to be applied by inhalation: such as vapor creasoti, a mixture of 12 minims of creosote in 8 fluidounces of boiling water, the vapor of which is to be inhaled.—6. Something unsubstantial, fleeting, or transitory; vain imagination; fantastic notion.

Gentlemen, these are very strange vapours, and very idle vapours. B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, ii. 1.

7†. pl. A hectoring or bullying style of language or conduct, adopted by ranters and swaggerers with the purpose of bringing about a real or mock quarrel.

They are at it [quarrelling] still, sir; this they call vapours. B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, iv. 3.

8. pl. A disease of nervous debility in which strange images seem to float hazily before the eyes, or appear as if real; hence, hypochondriacal affections; depression of spirit; dejection; spleen; "the blues": a term much affected in the eighteenth century, but now rarely used.

Some call it the fever on the spirits, some a nervous fever, some the vapours, and some the hysterics.
Fielding, Amelia, iii. 7.

Caused by a dearth of scandal, should the vapours
Distress our fair ones—let them read the papers.
Garrick, Prol. to Sheridan's School for Scandal.

But really these thick walls are enough to inspire the vapours if one never had them before.
Miss Burney, Cecilia, vi. 2.

Aqueous vapor. See aqueous.

vapor, vapour (vā′por), v. [< ME. vapouren, < OF. vaporer* = Sp. vaporization (vā″por-i-zā′shon), n. [= F. vaporisation = Sp. vaporización; as vaporize + -ation.] The act or process of vaporizing; the formation of vapor, or the state of being converted into vapor; treatment with vapor. Also spelled vaporisation.

All matter, even the most solid, he [Zöllner] says, must slowly suffer volatilization if its temperature is above the absolute null point. This he illustrates by the vaporization of ice and the smell of metals and minerals.
G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 131.

vaporize (vā′por-īz), v.; pret. and pp. vaporized, ppr. vaporizing. [= F. vaporiser: as vapor + -ize.] I. trans. 1. To convert into vapor by the application of heat, reduction of pressure, or other means; cause to evaporate.

The energy of our rivers and streams comes from the sun, too—for its heat vaporizes the water of the ocean, and makes the winds which carry it over the land, where it falls as rain, and, flowing to the ocean again, runs our mills and factories. Jour. Franklin Inst., CXXX. 89.

The World lay still, suffused with a jewel-light, as of vaporized sapphire. Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 757.

2. To affect with the vapors; render splenetic or hypochondriacal.

As vaporized ladies . . . run from spa to spa.
Macaulay, in Trevelyan, I. 358.

II. intrans. To pass off in vapor: as, sulphur or mercury vaporizes under certain conditions.

Iodine, allowed to vaporize at the temperature of boiling sulphur in presence of a large excess of air, showed no sign of dissociation. Amer. Jour. Sci., 3d ser., XLI. 323.

★ Also spelled vaporise.

vaporizer (vā′por-ī-zėr), n. [< vaporize + -er[1].] One or that which converts into vapor; a form of atomizer. Also spelled vaporiser.

Take a vaporiser, and let the same be kept well at work with Mentholised Water night and day.
Lancet, No. 3463, p. 25 of adv'ts.

vaporizing-stove (vā′por-ī-zing-stōv), n. A form of heater for supplying steam to the air of a greenhouse. It consists, usually, of a pan for water placed over a lamp.

★ vapor-lamp (vā′por-lamp), n. A vapor-burner, or a lamp constructed on the principle of the vapor-burner.

vaporole (vā′pō-rōl), n. [< vapor + -ole. An arbitrary word invented as a trade-mark.] A small thin glass capsule, containing a definite amount of a volatile drug, covered with a thin layer of cotton-wool and inclosed in a silk bag: used for vaporization, the glass being crushed in the fingers; also, a medicament intended for hypodermic injection, inclosed in a glass container.

vaporose (vā′pọr-ōs), a. [< LL. vaporosus, full of vapor: see vaporous.] Vaporous.

vaporosity (vā-pọ-ros′i-ti), n. [< vaporose + -ity.] The state or character of being vaporose or vaporous; vaporousness; blustering. Carlyle.

vaporous (vā′pọr-us), a. [Formerly also vaprous; = F. vaporeux = Sp. Pg. It. vaporoso, < LL. vaporosus, full of steam or vapor, < L. vapor, steam, vapor: see vapor.] 1. In the form or having the nature of vapor.

The statements in Genesis respecting the expanse suppose a previous condition of the earth in which it was encompassed with a cloudy, vaporous mantle, stretching continuously upward from the ocean.
Dawson, Nature and the Bible, p. 52.

2. Full of vapors or exhalations.

The vaporous night approaches.
Shak., M. for M., iv. 1. 58.

Over the waters in the vaporous West
The sun goes down as in a sphere of gold.
Browning, Paracelsus.

3. Promotive of exhalation or the flow of effluvia, vapor, gases, or the like; hence, windy; flatulent.

If the mother eat much beans, . . . or such vaporous food, . . . it endangereth the child to become lunatic.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 977.

4. Unsubstantial; vainly imaginative; whimsical; extravagant; soaring.

Let him but read the fables of Ixion, and it will hold him from being vaporous or imaginative.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, i.

A boy-dreamer [Shelley], . . . whose chief thoughts and hopes were centred in a vaporous millennium of equality and freedom. E. Dowden, Shelley, I. 245.

vaporously (vā′pọr-us-li), adv. 1. In a vaporous manner; with vapors.—2. Boastingly; ostentatiously.

Talking largely and vaporously of old-time experiences on the river.
S. L. Clemens, Life on the Mississippi, p. 495.

vaporousness (vā′pọr-us-nes), n. The state or character of being vaporous; mistiness.

The warmth and vaporousness of the air.
T. Birch, Hist. Roy. Soc., III. 416.

vapor-pan (vā′pọr-pan), n. A pan for evaporating water.

A vapor-pan is placed at each side of the fire-box for moistening the air. Jour. Franklin Inst., CXXII. 398.

vapor-plane (vā′pọr-plān), n. In meteor., the level of condensation; the altitude at which an ascending current of moist air is cooled to the dew-point and begins to condense. [Rare.]

vaporspout (vā′pọr-spout), n. A central column of condensed vapor appearing within a so-called waterspout or in its artificial imitation.

If it were necessary to change the name, which, as in many other things, was given before the thing was understood, it would be more appropriate to call them vapor-spouts, since they are evidently composed of condensed vapor. Ferrel, Treatise on the Winds, p. 419.

vapor-tension (vā′pọr-ten″shọn), n. Vapor-pressure; the elastic pressure of vapor, especially that of the aqueous vapor in the atmosphere: usually measured, like the pressure of the atmosphere, by the height of a column of mercury producing an equal pressure.

That most misleading of terms, vapour-tension.
Nature, XXX. 51.

vapory, vapoury (vā′pọr-i), a. [< vapor + -y[1].] 1. Vaporous; producing vapors; composed of or characterized by vapors: as, a vapory redness in the sky.

The waxen taper which I burn by night,
With the dull vap'ry dimness, mocks my sight.
Drayton, Rosamond to Hen. II.

Yet one smile more, departing, distant sun!
One mellow smile through the soft vapory air.
Bryant, November.

2. Affected with the vapors; hypochondriacal; splenetic; peevish: as, vapory humors.

vapour, vapoured, etc. See vapor, etc.

vapulation (vap-ū-lā′shọn), n. [< L. vapulare, be flogged or whipped, + -ation.] The act of beating or whipping; a flogging. [Rare.]

The coaches were numbered, although I can only find one notice of it: "So that, rather than to stand a Vapulation, one of them took Notice of his Number;" and the coachmen were noted for their incivility.
Ashton, Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, II. 171.

vapulatory (vap′ū-lā-tọ-ri), a. [< vapulate + -ory.] Of or pertaining to vapulation. [Rare.]

I am not, of course, arguing in favor of a return to those vapulatory methods; but the birch, like many other things that have passed out of the region of the practical, may have another term of usefulness as a symbol after it has ceased to be a reality. Lowell, Harvard Anniversary.

vaqueria (vak-e-rē′ä), n. [Sp., < vaquero, a cowherd: see vaquero, and cf. vaccary, vachery.] A farm for grazing cattle; a stock-farm.

A Vaquero.

vaquero (va-kā′rō), n. [Sp., = F. vacher, a cowherd: see vacher.] A herdsman.

The American cowboys of a certain range, after a brisk fight, drove out the Mexican vaqueros from among them.
T. Roosevelt, The Century, [XXXVI. 836.

var. An abbreviation (a) of variety (frequent in botany and zoölogy); (b) of variant (so used in this work).

vara (vä′rä), n. [< Chilian vara, a measure of length, lit. 'a pole,' < Sp. Pg. vara, rod, pole, cross-beam, yardstick: see vare[1].] A Spanish-American linear measure. In Spain, it equals 33.38 English inches; in Colombia, 31.5 inches; in British Honduras, 32.75 inches; in Bolivia, Chile, Costa Rica, and Peru, 32.9 inches; in California, Honduras, Paraguay, and Mexico, 33.0 inches; in Texas, 33.33 inches; in Cuba, Curaçao, and Venezuela, 33.4 inches; in the Argentine Republic, 34.1 inches; in Portugal and Brazil, 43.3 inches.

varan (var′an), n. [Also uran, ouran, uaran; = F. varan (Algerian ouran) (NL. Varanus), < Ar. waran, warel (Devic), warn, warl (Newman), a lizard.] A varanoid lizard; a monitor.

Varangian (vā-ran′ji-an), n. [< ML. Varangus*, Varingus (E. Waring), MGr. Βάραγγος, < Icel. Væringi, a Varangian, lit. 'a confederate,' < várar, pl. of vár*, oath, troth, plight, = AS. wǣr, covenant, oath, < wǣr, true, = L. verus, true: see warlock[1], very.] One of the Norse warriors who ravaged the coasts of the Baltic about the ninth century, and who (according to common account) overran part of Russia and formed an important element in the early Russian people.—Varangian Guard, a body-guard of the Byzantine emperors about the eleventh century, formed upon a nucleus of Varangians.

varanian (vā-rā′ni-an), a. and n. [< Varanus + -ian.] I. a. Belonging or related to the Varanidæ; resembling a varan.

II. n. One of the monitor-lizards.

Varanidæ (vā-ran′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Varanus + -idæ.] A family of eriglossate lacertilians, representing alone the superfamily Varanoidea, having confluent nasal bones, and the tongue insheathed at the base and deeply bifid anteriorly. The species inhabit Africa (excepting Madagascar), the Oriental region, and Australia. Also called Monitoridæ. See cuts under Hydrosaurus and acrodont.

varanoid (var′a-noid), a. and n. I. a. Resembling a varan or monitor; of or pertaining to the Varanoidea.

II. n. A varan or monitor.

Varanoidæ (var-a-nō′i-dē), n. pl. A family of lizards, in which the monitors, living and extinct, and the extinct mosasaurians, are together contrasted with the heloderms (as Helodermatoidea), both being assigned to the old group Platynota.

Varanoidea (var-a-noi′dē-ä), n. pl. [NL. (Gill, 1885), < Varanus + -oidea.] A superfamily of eriglossate lacertilians, the monitors or varanoids, represented by the single living family Varanidæ. See cuts under Hydrosaurus and acrodont.

Varanus (var′a-nus), n. [NL. (Merrem), < Ar. waran, lizard: see varan.] The typical genus of Varanidæ: synonymous with Monitor. Some of the fossil monitors reached a length of 30 feet, as V. (Megalania) priscus from the Pleistocene of Queensland. See cut under acrodont.

vardet (vär′det), n. An obsolete or dialectal form of verdict. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

vardingale† (vär′ding-gāl), n. An old spelling of farthingale.

Or, if they [stiff pickadils] would not bend, whipping your rebellious vardingales with my [Cupid's] bow string, and made them run up into your waists (they have lain so flat) for fear of my indignation.
B. Jonson, Challenge at Tilt.

vare[1]† (vār), n. [< Sp. Pg. vara, a rod, pole, yardstick, < L. vara, wooden horse or trestle for spreading nets, also a forked stick, < varus, bent, crooked: see varus.] A wand or staff of authority.

His hand a vare of justice did uphold;
His neck was loaded with a chain of gold.
Dryden, Abs. and Achit., i. 595.

vare[2] (vār), n. [Prob. a form of vair.] A weasel.

varec (var′ek), n. [< F. varech, OF. werecq, ★werech = Pr. varec (ML. warescum, wreckum), in one view < Icel. vágrek, lit. 'wave rack,' goods or objects thrown up by the sea, < vágr, a wave, + rek, drift, motion (see waw[1] and rack[3]); but prob. < AS. wræc, ME. wrak = D. wrak, etc., wreck, wrack: see wreck, wrack.] An impure sodium carbonate made in Brittany by burning seaweed: it corresponds to the English kelp.

vare-headed (vār′hed″ed), a. Having a head like that of a weasel; weasel-headed: as, the vare-headed widgeon, the pochard, Fuligula ferina. See under weasel-coot. [Local, British.]

vareuse (va-rèz′), n. [F.] A kind of loose jacket.

Cottonade pantaloons, stuffed into a pair of dirty boots, and a vareuse of the same stuff, made up his dress. His vareuse, unbuttoned, showed his breast brown and hairy.
G. W. Cable, Stories of Louisiana, Françoise, i.

vare-widgeon (vār′wij″ọn), n. The weasel-duck; the female or young male of the smew, Mergellus albellus. Montagu. [North Devon, Eng.]

vargueno (vär-gā′nō), n. [Named from the village of Vargas, near Toledo in Spain.] A cabinet of peculiar form, consisting of a box-shaped body without architectural ornaments, opening by means of a front hinged at the bottom edge, and the whole mounted on columns or a stand at a height convenient for writing on the opened cover used as a desk. The decoration is of geometrical character, and makes especial use of thin ironwork in pierced patterns, sometimes gilded and mounted on pieces of red cloth, leather, or the like, which form a background.

Spanish Vargueno, 17th century. (From "L'Art pour Tous.")

vari[1] (var′i), n. [= F. vari (Buffon), the ring-tailed lemur; prob. from a native name.] The macaco, or ruffed lemur, Lemur varius.

vari[2], n. Plural of varus.

variability (vā″ri-a-bil′i-ti), n. [= F. variabilité = Pg. variabilidade = It. variabilità; as variable + -ity.] 1. The quality or state of being variable; variableness.

A very few nebulæ have been suspected of variability, but in almost every instance the supposed change has been traced to errors of observation, impurity of the atmosphere, or other causes.
Appleton's Ann. Cyc., 1886, p. 56.

2. In biol., ability to vary; capability of variation; susceptibility to modification under conditions of environment, whether inherited or acquired; that plasticity or modifiability of any organism in virtue of which an animal or a plant may change in form, structure, function, size, color, or other character, lose some character or acquire another, and thus deviate from its parent-form; also, the kind or rate of variation in a given instance; the fact or act of varying. See variation, 8, variety, 6. Variability or mutability of some kind and to some extent is inherent in all organisms, and is transmissible like any other natural attribute or quality; it is therefore scarcely the antithesis of heredity (though the latter term often indicates or implies such fixity of type as an organism may derive from its parent-form, and which causes it to retain that form instead of acquiring a different form); yet variability has somewhat explicit reference to the tendency of organisms to become unlike their parents under external influences, and so to adapt themselves to their surroundings. Hence variability, though intrinsic, is called into play by the extrinsic conditions under which organisms vary, and in this way is counteractive of heredity, or the tendency to breed true. (See atavism and selection, 3.) The old notion of species as special creations, and as among the "constants of nature," subject to variation within very narrow limits which are themselves fixed in every case, finds no place in modern biological conceptions. (See species, 5.) The actual extent of variation which results from variability has been realized in all its significance only within the past thirty years, during which observations in every branch of natural history have demonstrated the universality of the fact, and shown the average rate or degree of variability to be much greater than had before been suspected. The cases of domestic animals and plants, first systematically studied by Darwin with special reference to variability, proved to be much less exceptional than they had been assumed to be; and the results of extending the same researches to the variability of organisms in a state of nature may be said to have entirely remodeled biology. See Darwinism and evolution, 2 (a), (b).

We see indefinite variability in the endless slight peculiarities which distinguish the individuals of the same species, and which cannot be accounted for by inheritance from either parent or from some more remote ancestor. Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 23.

3. In astron., the fact that a star or nebula changes its brightness in a more or less regular manner.—Generative variability, in biol., inherited variability; inherent tendency to vary away from ancestral characters, and thus not to revert or exhibit atavism. See the quotation.

It is only in those cases in which the modification has been comparatively recent and extraordinarily great that we ought to find the generative variability, as it may be called, still present in a high degree. For in this case the variability will seldom as yet have been fixed by the continued selection of the individuals varying in the required manner and degree, and by the continued rejection of those tending to revert to a former or less-modified condition. Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 154.

★variable (vā′ri-ạ-bl), a. and n. [< F. variable = Sp. variable = Pg. variavel = It. variabile, < LL. variabilis, changeable, < L. variare, change: see vary.] I. a. 1. Apt to change; changing or altering in a physical sense; liable to change; changeable.

Certeyne carpettes, coouerlettes, table clothes and hanginges made of gossamoine silke fynelye wrought after a straunge diuise with plesante and variable colours.
Peter Martyr (tr. in Eden's First Books on America, ed. [Arber, p. 129).

Species are more or less variable under the influence of external conditions, and the varieties so formed may or may not be true species. Dawson, Nature and the Bible, p. 134.

2. In bot. and zoöl., embracing many individuals and groups (varieties, subspecies, forms, states) which depart somewhat from the strict type: said of a species or, in a similar sense, of some particular character.—3. Liable to vary or change, in a moral sense; mutable; fickle; inconstant: as, variable moods.

O, swear not by the moon, the inconstant moon,
That monthly changes in her circled orb,
Lest that thy love prove likewise variable.
Shak., R. and J., ii. 2. 111.

Lydington was sent to Leith, where he died, and was suspected to be poisoned; a Man of the greatest Understanding in the Scottish Nation, and of an excellent Wit, but very variable; for which George Buchanan called him the Chamælion. Baker, Chronicles, p. 349.

4. Capable of being varied, altered, or changed; liable to change; alterable; in gram., capable of inflection.

I am sure he [Milton] would have stared if told that the "number of accents" in a pentameter verse was variable.
Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 297.

5. In math., quantitatively indeterminate, and considered with reference to the various determinations of quantity that are possible in the case. See II.

A quantity is said to be unrestrictedly variable in a region when it can assume all numerical values in this region. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 70.

6. In astron., changing in brightness.—Variable cut-off, in engines, valve-gear so arranged as to cut off the steam or other elastic fluid from its cylinder at any determined point in the stroke of the piston, thus allowing the remaining effort to be accomplished by expansion of that supplied at the first part of the stroke. See cut-off.—Variable gear, in mech., a form of geared wheels designed to impart alternating changes in the speed of any machine, as a slow advance and quick return in reciprocating movements. Such gears are made in the form of sectors of different radius, which are brought into action alternately as the gears revolve. Another form of variable-speed mechanism employs geared wheels of different diameters, with a broad drum for a belt, the drum being divided into different sections, and each section connected by a separate shaft or sleeve with one of the gears. By shifting the belt to different sections of the drum, variations in the speed are obtained. In other forms of variable-speed mechanism, cones and disks are used in frictional contact, the variations being obtained by changing the point of contact of the two cones or disks; the common case-pulley is also a form of variable-speed mechanism. See pulley.—Variable motion, in mech., motion which is produced by the action of a force which varies in intensity.—Variable screw. See *screw*1.—Variable species, in biol., any species whose variations are notably numerous or marked, or whose rate of variability is decidedly above the average. (See def. 2.) All species are variable, and incessantly varying; but some show less fixity of characters than others, or are just now undergoing much modification, or happen to be among those of which we possess many specimens illustrating marked departures from the assumed type-form, as subspecies, varieties, etc.; and such are the variable species of the naturalists' every-day language, so called by way of emphasis, not of strict definition. See, for example, strawberry.—Variable-speed pulleys, an arrangement of pulleys and gears to produce changing speeds; variable-speed wheels.—Variable-speed wheels, wheels combined to transmit variable motion; variable-speed pulleys.—Variable star, in astron., a star which undergoes changes of brightness whether periodic or irregular.

Variable Gear.

= Syn. 1 and 3. Wavering, unstable, vacillating, fluctuating, fitful.

II. n. 1. That which is variable; that which varies, or is subject or liable to vary or change.

There are many variables among the conditions which conspire for the production of a good photograph.
J. N. Lockyer.

2. In math., a quantity which is indeterminate, and is considered with reference to its different possible values; originally, a quantity capable of values continuously connected in one dimension, so that it could be conceived as running through them all in the course of time. This meaning still remains; but we now speak of the position of a point as variable in two or three dimensions, and we also speak of the arguments of functions in the calculus of finite differences, where there is no approach to continuity, as variables. The difference between an indeterminate constant and a variable is frequently a mere difference of designation; but constants, though indeterminate, are not usually considered with reference to the different values which they may take. Mathematically there is very little (and no precise) difference between a variable and an unknown.

3. A shifting wind, as opposed to a trade-wind; hence, the region or belt of the variables intermediate between the northeast and the southeast trade-winds. The region varies in width from about 150 to 500 miles, and is characterized by calms, shifting breezes, and sometimes violent squalls, the laws of which are not so readily understood as are those of the trade-winds. Other parts of the ocean where variable winds may be expected are also called regions of variables.

We find uniform trade-winds on each side the equator, almost uniting near it, and without a space of continuous "rains"—a limited interval only of variables and calms being found, during about ten months of the year.
Fitz Roy, Weather Book, p. 125.

Complex variable. See complex.—Dependent variable, any variable not the independent one.—Independent variable, in the calculus, the variable with reference to which the differentiations are performed; the variable to which the differentiations refer; also, the variable which is considered first, or as the parameter for the others. In any problem which may be proposed, it is a mere matter of convenience what variable shall be taken as the independent one; but after the equation is constructed the matter is in many cases determinate. In partial differential equations, equations of surfaces, etc., there are two or more independent variables.

variableness (vā′ri-ạ-bl-nes), n. The state or character of being variable. (a) In a physical sense, susceptibility of change; liableness or aptness to alter or to be altered; changeableness; variability: as, the variableness of the weather. (b) In a moral sense, mutability; inconstancy; unsteadiness; fickleness; levity: as, the variableness of human emotions.

The Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning [with whom can be no variation, neither shadow that is cast by turning, R. V.] Jas. i. 17.

variably (vā′ri-ạ-bli), adv. In a variable manner; changeably; inconstantly; unsteadily.

variance (vā′ri-ạns), n. [< ME. variance, variaunce, < OF. variance* = It. varianza, < L. varian(t-)s, variant: see variant.] 1. The state of being or the act of becoming variant; alteration; variation; change; difference.

Withoute chaunge or variaunce.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 5438.

2. In law, a discrepancy: (a) Between pleadings and proof, as where a complaint mentions a wrong date, or the facts prove to be different from what was alleged. (b) Between the form of the writ or process by which the action was commenced and the form of the declaration or complaint. Formerly, when variances were deemed more important than now, variance was often defined as a fatal discrepancy or disagreement, etc.; but in civil cases such variances between pleading and proof as do not actually mislead the adverse party are now disregarded as immaterial, and many others are amendable. Under what is known in the United States as the Code Practice, variance is used to designate a discrepancy in some particulars only, and is amendable if it has not misled, while a failure of proof as to the entire scope and meaning of an allegation is not regarded as a mere variance, but fatal.

3. Difference that produces disagreement or controversy; dispute; dissension; discord.

A sort of poor souls met, God's fools, good master,
Have had some little variance amongst ourselves.
Fletcher, Beggars' Bush, ii. 1.

Even among the zealous patrons of a council of state, the most irreconcilable variance is discovered concerning the mode in which it ought to be constituted.
Madison, Federalist, No. 38.

4†. Variableness; inconstancy.

She is Fortune verely,
In whom no man shulde affye,
Nor in hir yeftis have flaunce,
She is so fulle of variaunce.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 5482.

At variance. (a) In a state of difference or disagreement.

She runs, but hopes she does not run unseen,
While a kind glance at her pursuer flies.
How much at variance are her feet and eyes!
Pope, Spring, l. 60.

In proportion as men are habituated to maintain their own claims while respecting the claims of others . . . is produced a mental attitude at variance with that which accompanies subjection. H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 462.

(b) In a state of controversy or dissension; in a state of opposition or enmity.

I am come to set a man at variance against his father.
Mat. x. 35.

The Spaniards set York and Stanley at variance; they poyson York, and seize upon his Goods.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 373.

★= Syn. 1 and 3. Disagreement, etc. See difference.

★variant (vā′ri-ant), a. and n. [< ME. variaunt, varyaunt, < OF. variant, F. variant = Sp. Pg. It. variante, < L. varian(t-)s, ppr. of variare, change, vary: see vary.] I. a. 1. Different; diverse; having a different form or character: as, a variant form or spelling of a word.

He [Hooper] adopted them [Forty-two Articles] so far as he liked, in his own visitation Articles, anticipating their publication by two years; and this diocesan variant edition, so to call it, is of value as giving the mind of the father of Nonconformity, or at least the most eminent puritan contemporary, on several important points.
R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xx., note.

2. Variable; varying; changing; inconstant.

So variaunt of diversitee
That men in everiche myghte se
Bothe gret anoy and ek swetnesse.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 1917.

While above in the variant breezes
Numberless noisy weathercocks rattled and sang of mutation. Longfellow, Evangeline, i. 1.

3†. Unsettled; restless.

He is heer and ther;
He is so variaunt, he abit nowher.
Chaucer, Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 164.

II. n. Something that is substantially the same, though in a different form; in etym., a variant form or spelling of the same original word; in lit., a different reading or spelling.

These stories [French Folk-lore] are . . . interesting variants of those common to the rest of Europe.
N. A. Rev., CXXVII. 519.

It may be objected that some of these [local circumstances] are the characteristics of a variant rather than of a "version." N. and Q., 7th ser., XI. 70.

variate (vā′ri-āt), v.; pret. and pp. variated, ppr. variating. [< L. variatus, pp. of variare, change, vary: see vary.] I. trans. To make different; vary; diversify.

What was the cause of their multiplied, variated complotments against her?

★variation (vā-ri-ā′shọn), n. [Early mod. E. also variacyon, < ME. variacioun, < OF. (and F.) variation = Sp. variación = Pg. variação = It. variazione, < L. variatio(n-), a difference, variation, < variare, pp. variatus, change, vary: see vary.] 1. The act or process of varying; partial change in form, position, state, or qualities; alteration; mutation; diversity; variance; modification: as, variations of color; the slow variation of language.

After much variation of opinions, the prisoner at the bar was acquit of treason.
Sir J. Hayward, Life and Reign of Edw. VI., p. 322.

It is well known that in some instances of insidious shock, and in the earlier stages of purulent infection, the pulse will sometimes beat without abnormal variation.
J. M. Carnochan, Operative Surgery, p. 120.

2. The extent to which a thing varies; the degree, interval, or amount of departure from a former condition, position, or relation; amount or rate of change: as, a variation of two degrees; a variation of twopence in the pound.

The variations due to fatigue, fluctuation of the attention, and the like, were largely balanced.
W. H. Burnham, Amer. Jour. Psychol., II. 591.

3†. Difference.

There is great variation between him that is raised to the sovereignty by the favour of his peers and him that comes to it by the suffrage of the people.
B. Jonson, Discoveries.

4†. Variance; dissension; discord.

Thus the christen realmes were in variacyon, and the churches in great dyfference.
Berners, tr. of Froissart's Chron., cccxliv.

5. In gram., change of form of words, as in declension, conjugation, etc.; inflection.

The regular declensions and variations of nouns and verbs should be early and thoroughly learnt.
Watts, Improvement of the Mind, I. vii. § 1.

6. In astron., any deviation from the mean orbit or mean motion of a heavenly body, occasioned by another disturbing body. When these deviations are compensated in comparatively short periods of time they are called periodic variations, but when the compensation requires an immense period of time for its consummation the variation is called a secular variation.

7. In physics and nav., the deviation of a magnetic needle from the true north, denoted by the angle which the vertical plane passing through the poles of the needle freely suspended, and undisturbed by local attraction, makes with the geographical meridian of the place: generally and more properly called declination. The variation of the compass does not remain constantly the same in the same place, but undergoes certain diurnal, secular, and accidental changes. Of these the diurnal changes amount to only a small fraction of a degree; the secular change, however, may amount to 20° or 30° or more, and goes through a long cycle requiring for its completion some three or four centuries. Thus, in the year 1576, in London, the variation was 11° 15′ east; in 1652 the needle pointed due north, after which time it traveled about 24½° to the westward (the maximum being in 1815); the variation is now considerably less, and is continually decreasing. It is very different, however, in different parts of the globe. In the eastern part of the United States the variation is now westerly, and has been increasing since the last decade of the eighteenth century; but the annual change is now less than it was fifty years ago. In the western United States the variation is easterly, and has been in general diminishing; for a region in the extreme southwest, however, the needle is now stationary. The accidental variations are such as accompany magnetic storms, and are most frequent and violent at periods of about eleven and a half years, corresponding to the sun-spot period. See declination, agonic, isogonic[1].

The divergence of the position of the magnetic needle from the true north-and-south line is called its declination, or, by nautical men, its variation.
Huxley, Physiography, p. 10.

8. In biol., the act, process, or result of deviation from a given type of form or structure in a plastic vegetable or animal organization, by means of natural selection; or the sum of the phenomena resulting from the influence of conditions of environment, as opposed to those which would have been exhibited had the law of heredity alone been operative. See variability, 2, and variety, 6. Variation in the biological sense is the accomplishment of that which variability permits, environment requires, and selection directs; it covers the whole range of deviation from a given type, stock, or parent-form. Individual variation may be teratological, resulting in malformations or monstrosities, which are quite aside from the normal course of evolution, and probably never in perpetuity, though some freaks of nature, not decidedly pathological or morbid, are sometimes transmitted, as polydactylism in man, and the like. Another series of variations, less decidedly at variance with an ordinary development, and if not useless at least not hurtful to the organism, result in numberless sports, especially of cultivated plants and domesticated animals, which tend to perpetuation or may be perpetuated artificially. (See selection, 3 (artificial and methodical), sport, n., 8, and strain[2], 1.) The usual course of variation on a grand scale is believed to be by the natural selection of useful characters to be preserved and increased, with such decrease or extinction of their opposites as tends to their further improvement. The first decided steps in this direction are seen in the (mainly geographical or climatic) varieties, races, subspecies, and conspecies of ordinary descriptive zoology and botany; a step further brings us to the species; and most biologists hold that such increments of differences by insensible degrees have in fact resulted in the genus, the family, and all other distinctions which can be predicated among animals and plants. Variation is used in a more abstract sense, as nearly synonymous with variability: as, a theory of variation; and in a more concrete sense, like variety: as, this specimen is a variation of that one.

Some authors use the term variation in a technical sense, as implying a modification directly due to the physical conditions of life; and variations in this sense are supposed not to be inherited.
Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 25.

No two plants are indistinguishable, and no two animals are without differences. Variation is coextensive with Heredity. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 85.

9. In music, a tune or theme repeated with changes, elaborations, or embellishments, especially when made one of a series of movements aiming to develop the capacities of a given subject. The impulse to compose sets of variations of a melody was one of the early fruits of the desire for extended works in which an artistic unity should be manifest. In the beginning of this century this impulse was doubtless indulged to excess, ingenuity of mechanical invention and the desire for executive display being unduly prominent. But essentially the idea of the repetition of a given theme with decoration and transformation is involved in the whole theory of thematic development. The particular devices used to produce variations —such as melodic figuration, alteration of harmonic structure, change of mode or tonality, change of rhythm, etc. — are too many to be enumerated. Variations were formerly called doubles.

10. In the calculus, an infinitesimal increment of a function, due to changes in the values of the constants, and affecting it, therefore, in different amounts for different values of the variables.—11. In alg.: (a) The following of a + sign after a — sign, or vice versa, in a row of signs. (b) A linear arrangement of some of a given set of objects or of all. Thus, there are fifteen variations of the letters A, B, C, as follows: A, B, C, AB, BA, BC, CB, CA, AC, ABC, BCA, CAB, CBA, BAC, ACB.—Analogous variation, in biol., a variation occurring in a species or variety which resembles a normal character in another and distinct species or variety; a parallel variation. Darwin, Var. of Animals and Plants. —Correlated variation, in biol., a variation in any part of one organism which is correlated with and consequent upon the variation of another part of the same organism. The idea is that the whole organization of any individual is so bound together during its growth and development that when slight variations in any one part occur, and are accumulated through natural selection, other parts become modified. Darwin, Orig. of Species, p. 146.—Function of limited variation. See function.—Method of concomitant variations. See method.—Method or calculus of variations, a branch of the differential calculus established by the Bernoullis, Euler, and Lagrange, the object of which is to solve certain problems, called problems of isoperimetry, in which one curve, surface, etc., is compared with another in regard to certain conditions. For example, the earliest problem of the calculus of variations was that of the brachistochrone—Given two points A and B, to find the curve along which a particle will fall in least time from A to B. A variation is denoted by a lower-case Greek delta.—Movements of variation, in physiol., movements exhibited by mobile organs in plants, generally occurring in response to an external stimulation, as in the sensitive plant.—Parallel variation, in biol., same as analogous variation. Darwin, Var. of Animals and Plants.—Right of variation, in canon law, the right of a lay patron during an established period to suggest, for confirmation by the proper ecclesiastical authority, the diversion of a benefice already presented to a different candidate. A right of variation by which the ecclesiastic having the appointing power is obliged to appoint the second candidate presented is called privative; and the right of presentation by which he may appoint at his own discretion either of the candidates presented is called cumulative. McClintock and Strong.—Variation of parameters, a change in an equation by which some of its constants are made functions of the variables. The application of this device to the solution of differential equations is called the method of the variation of parameters.—Variation of the elements, a method for the solution of a dynamical problem which differs only slightly from another whose solution is known.—Variation of the moon, an inequality in the moon's rate of motion, occasioned by the attraction of the sun, and depending as to its degree on the moon's position in her orbit, consisting in an acceleration in longitude from the quadratures to the syzygies, and a retardation from the syzygies to the quadratures. It was discovered by Tycho Brahe (1546–1601).—Variation-permanence. See Newton's rule, under rule[1].—Variations of state, in engraving, the results of all changes made on a plate by cutting, retouching, erasing inscriptions and substituting others, altering publisher's address, methods of printing, etc., according to which, in important engravings, the impressions are classified.

variational (vā-ri-ā′shon-al), a. [< variation + -al.] Of or pertaining to variation, especially in its biological senses: as, a variational fact or doctrine; variational characters: in the latter instance, synonymous with varietal. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 77.

variation-chart (vā-ri-ā′shon-chärt), n. A chart on which lines, called isogonic lines, are drawn passing through places having the same magnetic variation. See cut under isogonic.

variation-compass (vā-ri-ā′shon-kum″pas), n. A declination-compass.

★variator (vā′ri-ā-tor), n. A joint used in underground electrical mains to allow for the expansion or contraction of the metal with changes of temperature.

varicated (var′i-kā-ted), a. [< NL. varix (varic-), a varix, + -ate[1] + -ed[2].] In conch., having varices; marked by varicose formations.

varication (var-i-kā′shon), n. [< NL. varix (varic-) + -ation.] In conch., formation of a varix; a set or system of varices.

★varicella (var-i-sel′ä), n. [= F. varicelle, < NL. varicella, < vari(ola) + dim. -c-ella.] A specific contagious disease, usually of childhood, characterized by an eruption of vesicles of moderate size, filled with a clear, slightly yellowish fluid; chicken-pox; swine-pox. There is usually but little if any fever or other constitutional disturbance. Rarely one or more of the vesicles will leave a slight pit in the skin resembling a smallpox-scar. The disease is very mild, and is seldom or never fatal.—Varicella gangrenosa, a rare form of chicken-pox in which the eruption terminates in gangrenous ulceration.

varicellar (var-i-sel′är), a. [< varicella + -ar[3].] Of or relating to varicella.—Varicellar fever. (a) The initial fever of chicken-pox. (b) Modified smallpox: varioloid. [Rare and erroneous.]

varicellate (var-i-sel′āt), a. [< varicella + -ate[1].] In conch., having small varices.

varicelloid (var-i-sel′oid), a. [< varicella + -oid.] Resembling varicella.—Varicelloid smallpox, modified smallpox; varioloid.

varices, n. Plural of varix.

variciform (var′i-si-fôrm), a. [< L. varix, a dilated vein, + forma, form: see form.] Resembling a varix; varicose; knotty.

varicoblepharon (var″i-kō-blef′a-ron), n. [NL., < L. varix (varic-), a dilated vein, + Gr. βλέφαρον, eyelid.] A varicose tumor of the eyelid.

varicocele (var′i-kō-sēl), n. [= F. varicocèle, < L. varix, a dilated vein, + Gr. κήλη, a tumor.] A tumor in the scrotum, composed of the varicosed veins of the spermatic cord. The term was employed by the older medical writers to designate also a varicose condition of the scrotal veins.

varicoid (var′i-koid), a. [< L. varix, a dilated vein, + -oid.] Same as variciform.

varicolored, varicoloured (vā′ri-kul-ord), a. [< L. varius, various, + color, color, + -ed[2].] Diversified in color; variegated; motley.

Vary-colour'd shells. Tennyson, Arabian Nights.

The right wing of Schleiermacher's varicolored following. The American, VII. 278.

varicolorous (vā-ri-kul′or-us), a. [< L. varius, various, + color, color, + -ous.] Variously colored; variegated in color.

varicorn (vā′ri-kôrn), a. and n. [< L. varius, various, + cornu = E. horn.] I. a. Having diversiform or variously shaped antennæ; of or pertaining to the Varicornes.

II. n. A varicorn beetle.

Varicornes (vā-ri-kôr′nēz), n. pl. [NL., < L. varius, various, + cornu = E. horn.] In some systems, a legion of Coleoptera, including the clavicorns, lamellicorns, and serricorns. [Rare.]

varicose (var′i-kōs), a. [< L. varicosus, full of dilated veins, < varix (varic-), a dilated vein: see varix.] 1. Of or relating to varix; affected with varix.

I observed that nearly all of them [bearers] had large varicose veins in their legs, owing to the severity of their avocation. W. H. Russell, Diary in India, II. 91.

The skin covering the morbid growth was rough, and showed large blue varicose veins ramifying over the surface. J. M. Carnochan, Operative Surgery, p. 79.

2. Designed for the cure or relief of varicose veins: applied to elastic fabrics made into stockings, bandages, etc., used for this purpose.—3. In zoöl., prominent and tortuous, as formations upon a shell; resembling or having varices; varicated.—Varicose aneurism, an aneurismal sac having communication with both an artery and a vein. See aneurismal varix, under aneurismal.—Varicose angioma, dilatation of the minute veins or venous radicles.—Varicose lymphatics, dilated lymphatic vessels.—Varicose ulcer, an ulcer of the leg caused by the presence of varicose veins.—Varicose veins, a condition in which the superficial veins, usually of the lower extremity, are dilated, the valves giving them a beaded appearance.

varicosed (var′i-kōst), a. [< varicose + -ed[2].] In a condition of varix: noting veins.

varicosity (var-i-kos′i-ti), n.; pl. varicosities (-tiz). [< varicose + -ity.] A varix.

varicous (var′i-kus), a. [< L. varicosus, varicose: see varicose.] Same as varicose.

varicula (vā-rik′ū-lä), n.; pl. variculæ (-lē). [NL., < L. varicula, dim. of varix (varic-), a dilated vein: see varix.] A varix of the conjunctiva.

varied (vā′rid), p. a. 1. Altered; partially changed; changed.

These, as they change, Almighty Father, these Are but the varied God. Thomson, Hymn.

2. Characterized by variety; consisting of various kinds or sorts: as, a varied assortment of goods.—3. Differing from one another; diverse; various: as, commerce with its varied interests.—4. Variegated in color: as, the varied thrush.—Varied pickerel, shrike, thrush. See the nouns.

variedly (vā′rid-li), adv. Diversely.

Variegatæ (vā″ri-e-gā′tē), n. pl. [NL. (Guenée, 1852), fem. pl. of LL. variegatus: see variegate.] An important group of noctuid moths, belonging to the division Quadrifidæ, and including eight of Guenée's families, the most important being the Plusiidæ. They have the body small or of moderate size, the proboscis long or moderate, palpi well developed, the fore wings metallic or with a silky luster, or with the inner border angular or denticulate, and the hind wings of one color, occasionally pale or yellow with a dark border. See cut under Plusia.

variegate (vā′ri-e-gāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. variegated, ppr. variegating. [= Sp. Pg. variegado, < LL. variegatus, pp. of variegare, make of various sorts or colors, < L. varius, various (see various), + agere, make, do.] To diversify by means of different tints or hues; mark with different colors in irregular patches; spot, streak, dapple, etc.: as, to variegate a floor with marble of different colors.

Each particular thing is variegated, or wears a mottled coat. Bacon, Fable of Pan.

variegated (vā′ri-e-gā-ted), p. a. Varied in color; irregularly marked with different colors.—Variegated copper. Same as bornite.—Variegated monkey, the douc, Semnopithecus nemæus.—Variegated pebbleware. See pebbleware.—Variegated sandstone. Same as New Red Sandstone (which see, under sandstone).—Variegated sheldrake, Tadorna variegata.—Variegated sole. See sole[2].—Variegated spider-monkey, Ateles variegatus.—Variegated tanager, thrush, etc. See the nouns.

variegation (vā″ri-e-gā′shọn), n. [= Pg. variegação; as variegate + -ion.] 1. Varied coloration; the conjunction of various colors or color-marks; party-coloration.—2. In bot.: (a) The conjunction of two or more colors in the petals, leaves, and other parts of plants. (b) A condition of plants in which the leaves become partially white or of a very light color, from suppression or modification of the chlorophyl. Plants showing this unnatural condition may be otherwise quite healthy, and are often prized on account of their peculiar appearance. The cause is not well known. It sometimes occurs in a single branch of a tree, and may be thence propagated by grafting. As a permanent and often congenital peculiarity it is to be distinguished from chlorosis (which compare).

variegator (vā′ri-e-gā-tọr), n. [< variegate + -or[1].] One who or that which variegates.

varier (vā′ri-ėr), n. [< vary + -er[1].] One who varies; one who deviates.

Pious variers from the church. Tennyson, Sea Dreams.

★varietal (vạ-rī′e-tạl), a. [< variet-y + -al.] In biol., having the character of a zoölogical or botanical variety; subspecific, or of the character of a subspecies; racial, with reference to geographical variation; of or pertaining to varieties; variational: as, varietal characters; varietal differences or distinctions. See variability, 2, variation, 8, and variety, 6.

varietally (vạ-rī′e-tạl-i), adv. In biol., in a varietal manner or relation; as a variety; to a varietal extent only; subspecifically. J. W. Dawson, Nature and the Bible, p. 174. ★ variety (vạ-rī′e-ti), n.; pl. varieties (-tiz). [Early mod. E. also varietie, variete; < OF. variete, F. variété = Sp. variedad = Pg. variedade = It. varietà, < L. varieta(t-)s, difference, diversity, < varius, different, various: see various.] 1. The state or character of being varied or various; intermixture of different things, or of things different in form, or a succession of different things; diversity; multifariousness; absence of monotony or uniformity; dissimilitude.

Their Oathes (especially of their Emperors) are of many cuts, and varietie of fashion. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 295.

Variety I ask not; give me One
To live perpetually upon.
Cowley, The Mistress, Resolved to be Beloved, i.

Variety 's the very spice of life,
That gives it all its flavor.
Cowper, Task, ii. 606.

2. Exhibition of different characteristics by one individual; many-sidedness; versatility.

Age cannot wither her, nor custom stale
Her infinite variety; other women cloy
The appetites they feed. Shak., A. and C., ii. 2. 241.

3†. Variation; deviation; change.

Hee also declared certeyne thynges as concerninge the variete of the northe pole.
Peter Martyr (tr. in Eden's First Books on America, ed. [Arber, p. 90).

Immouable, no way obnoxious to varietie or change.
Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 95.

4. A collection of different things; a varied assortment.

Two Crucifixes of inestimable worth, beset with wonderful variety of precious stones, as Carbuncles, Rubies, Diamonds. Coryat, Crudities, I. 45.

5. Something differing from others of the same general kind; one of many things which agree in their general features; a sort; a kind: as, varieties of rock, of wood, of land, of soil; to prefer one variety of cloth to another.—6. In biol., with special reference to classification: (a) A subspecies; a subdivision of a species; an individual animal or plant which differs, or collectively those individuals which differ, from the rest of its or their species, in certain recognizable particulars which are transmissible, and constant to a degree, yet which are not specifically distinctive, since they intergrade with the characters of other members of the same species; a race, especially a climatic or geographical race which arises without man's interference. See species, 5. As the biological conception of species excludes the notion of special creation, or of any original fixation of specific distinctions, so the same conception regards varieties as simply nascent species which may or may not be established; if established, varieties have become species in the process, as soon as the steps of that process are obliterated. A variety has in itself the making of a species, and all species are supposed to have thus been made. The distinction being always in degree only, and never in kind, the actual recognition of both varieties and species for the purposes of classification, nomenclature, and description is largely a matter of tact and experience. See trinomialism. (b) A race, as of cultivated plants or domestic animals; a stock; a strain; a sport; a breed: a general term, covering all the modifications which may be impressed upon animals and plants by artificial selection. See the more distinctive words, especially race, n., 5 (b). Varieties of this grade seldom reach the permanence of those attributed to natural selection, and tend to revert if left to themselves, though the actual differences may be greater than those marking natural varieties. (See Dysodus.) In like manner the term variety is applied to inorganic substances of the same kind which are susceptible of classification, to note differences in color, structure, crystallization, and the like, all the varieties being referable to some one species which is assumed as the typically perfect standard: as, varieties of quartz or of diamond. See subspecies.—Climatic variety, a natural variety of any species produced by climatic influences, or specially affected by such influences, or regarded with particular reference to climate. As climate itself is largely a matter of geography, a climatic variety is almost necessarily a geographical variety, and the terms are interchangeable. See below.—Geographical variety, a natural variety of any species whose range of distribution is coincident with a given geographical region, and whose varietal peculiarities have been caused by, or are dependent for their perpetuity upon, local influences, especially climate; a climatic variety; a local race. Animals and plants which have a wide geographical distribution are almost always found to run into geographical races, which may be so strongly marked that there is great difference of opinion among naturalists respecting their full specific or only varietal valuation. The principal exceptions are in those forms whose individuals may be wide-ranging, through unusual powers of locomotion, as those birds which perform extensive annual migrations, and are therefore not continually subjected to modifying local influences. Geographical variation, under any given degree of climatic difference, is strongly favored by insulation, or anything which tends to a sort of natural in-and-in breeding of comparatively few individuals, as is well illustrated in the fauna and flora of islands, where geographical varieties tend to develop speedily into species distinct from those of neighboring islands. Mountain-ranges and desert areas always develop a fauna and flora of a facies peculiar to themselves. The main climatic factors in the evolution of geographical varieties are relative temperature and relative humidity.—Variety hybrid, a mongrel resulting from crossing individuals of opposite sexes of different varieties of the same species. They are much more numerous than hybrids between different species, and are usually very easy to bring about with proper selection of the stocks from which to breed. They are also usually fertile, which as a rule is not the case with the progeny of thoroughly distinct species.

variety-planer (vạ-rī′e-ti-plā″nėr), n. See molding-machine, 1.

variety-show (vạ-rī′e-ti-shō), n. An entertainment consisting of dances, songs, negro-minstrelsy, gymnastics, or specialties of any kind, sometimes including farces or short sketches written to exhibit the accomplishments of the company.

variety-theater (vạ-rī′e-ti-thē″ạ-tėr), n. A theater devoted to variety-shows.

variform (vā′ri-fôrm), a. [= It. variforme, < L. varius, various, + forma, form.] Varied in form; having different shapes; diversiform.

variformed (vā′ri-fôrmd), a. [< variform + -ed[2].] Same as variform.

varify (vā′ri-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. varified, ppr. varifying. [< L. varius, various, + -ficare, < facere, make, do (see -fy).] To diversify; variegate; color variously. [Rare.]

May is seen,
Suiting the Lawns in all her pomp and pride
Of liuely Colours, louely varified.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Magnificence.

★variola (vạ-rī′ọ-lạ), n. [= F. variole = Sp. viruela, < ML. variola, also variolus, smallpox, < L. varius, various, spotted: see various.] 1. Smallpox; a specific contagious disease characterized by an eruption of papules, becoming vesicular and then pustular, and attended by high fever, racking pains in the head and spine, and severe constitutional disturbance. The eruption in its vesicular stage is umbilicated, and it is apt to leave a number of roundish depressed scars, the pits or pockmarks. See smallpox.

2. [cap.] [NL. (Swainson, 1839).] A genus of fishes.—Variola confluens, discreta, hæmorrhagica. Same as confluent, discrete, hemorrhagic smallpox. See smallpox.—Variola inserta, a smallpox produced by inoculation.—Variola ovina, sheep-pox.

variolar (vạ-rī′ọ-lạr), a. [< variola + -ar[3].] Same as variolous.

Variolaria (vạ-rī″ri-ọ-lā′ri-ạ), n. [NL. (Bulliard, 1780); < ML. variola, smallpox: see variola.] A genus of pyrenomycetous fungi, the type of which is V. melogramma. The later genus Melogramma of Fries was based upon this species.

variolarine (vạ-rī″ri-ọ-lā′rin), a. [< Variolaria + -ine[1].] In bot., of or pertaining to the genus Variolaria; pustulate.

variolarioid (vạ-rī″ri-ọ-lā′ri-oid), a. [< Variolaria + -oid.] In bot., resembling or pertaining to the genus Variolaria.

★variolate (vā′ri-ọ-lāt), a. [< ML. variola + -ate[1].] 1. In entom., resembling a scar of smallpox: noting impressions or foveæ when they have a central prominence.—2. In bot., thickly marked with pustules or pits, as in smallpox.

variolated (vā′ri-ọ-lā ted), a. [< variolate + -ed[2].] Inoculated with the virus of smallpox.

variolation (vạ-rī″ri-ọ-lā′shọn), n. [< variola + -ation.] Inoculation with the virus of smallpox. See inoculation, 2. Also variolization.—Bovine variolation, inoculation of a cow with the virus of smallpox, for the purpose of obtaining vaccine virus from the eruption resulting.

variole (vā′ri-ōl), n. [< F. variole, < ML. variola, smallpox: see variola.] 1. In zoöl., a shallow pit, or slightly pitted marking, like the pitting of a smallpox-pustule; a foveole.—2. In lithol., a spherulite of the rock called variolite.

The spherulites or varioles [of the variolite-diabase from the Durance) are grouped or drawn out in bands parallel to the surface, being in some places almost microscopic, in others 5 centim. in diameter.
Cole and Gregory, Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLVI. 312.

variolic (vạ-ri-ol′ik), a. [= F. variolique; as variola + -ic.] Variolous.

variolite (vā′ri-ọ-līt), n. [< variola + -ite[2].] A rock in which there is a more or less distinctly concretionary arrangement, giving rise to pustular or pea-like forms which are disseminated through a finely crystalline ground-mass, and which, from their resemblance as seen on weathered surfaces to smallpox-pustules, have for hundreds of years made this rock an object of curiosity. In India variolite has been held in high respect as a preventive of or cure for smallpox, being worn as an amulet suspended from the neck, or used in other similar ways. The name by which it has been known there is gamaïcu. From the time of Aldrovandi till now, variolite has occupied the attention of geologists and lithologists. The best-known locality, by far, of this curious rock is the region of the river Durance, near the border of France and Italy. A rock very similar in character to the variolite of the Durance is found in the district of Olonetz in Russia. Variolite is now most generally regarded as a product of contact-metamorphism. The varioles or spherulites of this rock seem rather variable in composition, but chiefly made up of a triclinic feldspar. The Durance variolite is defined by its latest investigators (Messrs. Cole and Gregory) as being "a devitrified spherulitic tachylyte, typically coarse in structure."

variolitic (vā″ri-ọ-lit′ik), a. [< variolite + -ic.] In lithol., pertaining to, resembling, or containing variolite.

variolitism (vā′ri-ọ-līt-izm), n. [< variolite + -ism.] A less correct form of variolitization.

Lœwinson-Lessing seems inclined to abandon variolite as the name of a rock-species in favor of spherulitic augite-porphyrite, retaining it, however, in the form of variolitism for that of a process.
Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLVI. 330.

variolitization (vā″ri-ọ-lit-i-zā′shọn), n. [< variolite + -ize + -ation.] In lithol., conversion into variolite; change in a rock of such a character as to give rise to the peculiar structure denominated variolitic. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLVI. 330.

variolization (vā-ri-ol-i-zā′shọn), n. [< variola + -ize + -ation.] Same as variolation.

varioloid (vā′ri-ọ-loid), a. and n. [= Sp. varioloide; < ML. variola, smallpox, + Gr. εἶδος, form.] I. a. 1. Resembling variola or smallpox.—2. Resembling measles; having the appearance of measles, as the skin of diseased pigs.

II. n. Modified smallpox; a mild form of smallpox which may abort at the vesicular stage, occurring usually in those who are partially protected by vaccination. The disease is seldom fatal, yet it is true smallpox, may be followed by pitting, and is capable of communicating by contagion the most virulent form of the disease.

variolous (vā-rī′ō-lus), a. [= F. varioleux, < ML. variolosus, pitted with smallpox, < variola, smallpox: see variola.] 1. Of or pertaining to or designating smallpox; variolar; variolic.—2. In entom., having somewhat scattered and irregular varioles.

Also variolar.

variolo-vaccine (vā-rī″ō-lō-vak′sin), n. Lymph or crusts obtained from a heifer with variolo-vaccinia.

variolo-vaccinia (vā-rī″ō-lō-vak-sin′i-ä), n. Vaccinia resulting from inoculation with small-pox-virus.

variometer (vā-ri-om′e-tėr), n. [< L. varius, various, + Gr. μέτρον, measure.] An instrument used in comparing the intensity of magnetic forces, especially the magnetic force of the earth at different points—for example, as varied by local causes. One form consists of four stationary magnets in whose field is suspended a delicate magnetic needle; the change in the position of this needle as the instrument is placed at different points gives a means of comparing the corresponding external forces.

variorum (vā-ri-ō′rum), a. [In the phrase variorum edition, a half-translation of L. editio cum notis variorum, edition with notes of various persons, variorum, gen. pl. of varius, various: see various.] Noting an edition of some work in which the notes of different commentators are inserted: as, a variorum edition of Shakspere.

various (vā′ri-us), a. [< L. varius, diverse, various, party-colored, variegated, also changing, changeable, fickle, etc. Hence ult. variety, vary, variant, variegate, etc.] 1. Differing from one another; different, diverse; manifold: as, men of various occupations.

So many and so various laws are given.
Milton, P. L., xii. 282.

How various, how tormenting,
Are my Miseries! Congreve, Semele, i. 1.

2. Divers; several.

Dukes of the most modern Austria . . . have all of them at various times borne rule over the whole or part of the older Austria of Lombardy. E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 5.

3. Changeable; uncertain; inconstant; variable; unfixed.

My comfort is that their [men's] judgment is too weak to endanger you, since by this it confesses that it mistakes you, in thinking you irresolved or various.
Donne, Letters, xc.

The servile suitors watch her various face,
She smiles preferment, or she frowns disgrace.
Sheridan, The Rivals, Epil.

4. Exhibiting different characters; variform; diversiform; multiform.

A man so various that he seemed to be
Not one, but all mankind's epitome.
Dryden, Abs. and Achit., i. 545.

5. Having a diversity of features; not uniform or monotonous; diversified.

My grandfather was of a various life, beginning first at court, where, after he had spent most part of his means, he became a soldier, and made his fortune with his sword at the siege of St. Quintens in France and other wars.
Lord Herbert of Cherbury, Life (ed. Howells), p. 24.

A happy rural seat of various view.
Milton, P. L., iv. 247.

A various host they came — whose ranks display
Each mode in which the warrior meets the fight.
Scott, Vision of Don Roderick, The Vision, st. 57.

It is a common belief that Mr. Webster was a various reader; and I think it is true.
R. Choate, Addresses, p. 235.

variously (vā′ri-us-li), adv. In various or different ways; diversely; multifariously.

variousness (vā′ri-us-nes), n. The character or state of being various; variety; multifariousness.

variscite (var′i-sīt), n. [< L. Variscia, Voigtland (now part of Saxony), + -ite[2].] A hydrous phosphate of aluminium, occurring in crystalline or reniform crusts of a bright-green color.

varix (vā′riks), n.; pl. varices (var′i-sēz). [= F. varice = Sp. variz, varice = Pg. varix = It. varice, < L. varix (varic-), a dilated vein, < varus, bent, stretched: see varus.] 1. Abnormal dilatation or tortuosity of a vein or other vessel of the body; also, a vein, artery, or lymphatic thus dilated or tortuous; a varicose vessel.—2. [NL.] In conch., a mark or scar on the surface of a shell denoting a former position of the lip of the aperture, which has passed on with the periodical growth of the shell. Varices are conspicuous in some univalves. See cuts under murex and triton.

—Aneurismal varix. See aneurismal.—Lymphatic varix, dilatation of the lymphatic vessels.

varlet (vär′let), n. [< ME. varlet, verlet, < OF. varlet, also vaslet, vallet, vadlet, valet, F. valet, a groom, younker, squire, stripling, youth, servant, for vassalet*, < ML. vassaletus*, dim. of vassallus, a servant, vassal: see vassal. Doublet of valet.] 1. Originally, a very young man of noble or knightly birth, serving an apprenticeship in knightly exercises and accomplishments while awaiting elevation to the rank of knight; hence (because such youths served as pages or personal servants to the knights who had charge of them), a body-servant or attendant. (See valet.) The name was also given to the city bailiffs or serjeants.

One of these laws [of Richard II.] enacts "that no varlets called yeomen" should wear liveries; the other, "that no livery should be given under colour of a Gild or fraternity, or of any other association, whether of gentry or servants, or of commonalty."
English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. cxlviii.

Call here my varlet; I'll unarm again.
Shak., T. and C., i. 1. 1.

Why, you were best get one o' the varlets of the city, a serjeant. B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, iv. 7.

Three varlets that the king had hir'd
Did likely him betray.
Robin Hood Rescuing Will Stutly (Child's Ballads, V. 283).

2. Hence, one in a subordinate or menial position; a low fellow; a scoundrel; a rascal; a rogue: a term of contempt or reproach.

Ana. My name is Ananias.
Sub. Out, the varlet
That cozened the apostles!
B. Jonson, Alchemist, ii. 1.

Well, I am glad you are not the dull, insensible varlet you pretended to be. Sheridan, The Rivals, iv. 2.

3†. The coat-card now called the knave or jack (in French, valet).

varletess† (vär′let-es), n. [< varlet + -ess.] A female varlet; a waiting-woman. Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe, I. xxxi.

varletry (vär′let-ri), n. [< varlet + -ry: see -ery.] The rabble; the crowd; the mob.

The shouting varletry
Of censuring Rome. Shak., A. and C., v. 2. 56.

varmin, varmint (vär′min, vär′mint), n. Dialectal variants of vermin. Also varment.

Among the topmost leaves . . . a dark looking savage was nestled, partly concealed by the trunk of the tree, and partly exposed, as though looking down . . . to ascertain the effect produced by his treacherous aim. . . . "This must be looked to!" said the scout. . . . "Uncas, . . . we have need of all our we'pons to bring the cunning varment from his roost."
J. F. Cooper, Last of Mohicans, viii.

The low public-house . . . was the rendezvous of the press-gang, . . . who were one and all regarded in the light of mean kidnappers and spies — varmint, as the common people esteemed them.
Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, i.

★varnish (vär′nish), n. [< ME. vernysh, vernisch, vernysche = D. vernis = MHG. firnis, G. firniss = Sw. fernissa = Dan. fernis, < OF. (and F.) vernis, varnish (cf. vernis, adj., polished), = Pr. vernitz = Sp. berniz, barniz = Pg. verniz = It. vernice (> NGr. βερνίκι), (ML. vernicium, fernisium), varnish: see varnish, v.] 1. A solution of resinous matter, forming a clear limpid fluid capable of hardening without losing its transparency: used by painters, gilders, cabinet-makers, and others for coating over the surface of their work in order to give it a shining, transparent, and hard surface, capable of resisting in a greater or less degree the influences of air and moisture. The resinous substances most commonly employed for varnishes are amber, anime, copal, mastic, rosin, sandarac, and shellac, which may be colored with arnotto, asphalt, gamboge, saffron, turmeric, or dragon's-blood. The solvents are (a) fixed or volatile oils or mixtures of them (as linseed-oil or spirits of turpentine), and (b) concentrated alcohol or methylated spirits; hence the varnishes are divided into two classes, oil-varnishes and spirit-varnishes.

Varnish, that makes ceilings not only shine, but last.
Bacon, Vain Glory (ed. 1887).

To Greatorex's, and there he showed me his varnish, which he hath invented, which appears every whit as good, upon a stick which he hath done, as the Indian.
Pepys, Diary, I. 424.

2. That which resembles varnish, either naturally or artificially; a glossy or lustrous appearance.

So doe I more the sacred Tongue esteem (Though plaine and rurall it do rather seem,
Then schoold Athenian; and Diuinitie,
For onely varnish, haue but Verity).
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 2.

The varnish of the holly and ivy. Macaulay.

3. An artificial covering to give a fair appearance to any act or conduct; outside show; gloss; palliation; "whitewash."

We'll put on those shall praise your excellence,
And set a double varnish on the fame
The Frenchman gave you. Shak., Hamlet, iv. 7. 133.

Count Orloff, whose gigantic figure was all in a blaze with jewels, and in whose demeanour the untamed ferocity of the Scythian might be discerned through a thin varnish of French politeness. Macaulay, Mme. D'Arblay.

4. In ceram., the thin gloss or glaze of pottery.

—Amalgam, amber, antiseptic, asphalt varnish. See the qualifying words.—Black varnish, a natural varnish or lacquer, the product of several trees (see varnish-tree), chiefly the Burmese or Martaban varnish, consisting of the sap of Melanorrhœa usitata. This is a thick, viscid, grayish, terebinthinous substance, soon turning black on exposure, and drying very slowly. Nearly every vessel in Burma, whether for holding liquids or solids, is lacquered with this substance, as well as furniture, idols, temples, etc.—French varnish, a varnish made by dissolving white shellac in alcohol. Sometimes a little gum sandarac is added.—Lac varnish. Same as lacquer.—Lac water-varnish. See lac[2].—Lithographic varnish. See lithographic.—Piny varnish. Same as piny resin. See piny[1] and Vateria.—Printers' varnish. See printer.—Sealing-wax varnish. See sealing-wax.—Shellac varnish. See shellac.—Varnish colors. See color.—Varnish sumac. See sumac.

varnish (vär′nish), v. [Early mod. E. also vernish; < ME. vernysshen, vernischen = D. vernissen = G. firnissen = Sw. fernissa = Dan. fernisse, < OF. (and F.) vernisser, varnish, sleek, glaze over with varnish, = Sp. barnizar = Pg. (en)vernizar = It. verniciare, also vernicare (cf. NGr. βερνικιάζειν, varnish); from the noun, but perhaps in part from the orig. verb, OF. vernir (verniss-), varnish, perhaps < ML. as if vitrinire*, lit. 'glaze,' < ML. vitrinus (> Pr. veirin), of glass, glassy, < vitrum, glass: see vitrine. The Rom. forms of the noun are somewhat irregular; the Sp. Pg. It. are prob. due in part to the OF.] I. trans. 1. To lay varnish on for the purpose of decorating or protecting the surface. See varnish, n., 1.

Wel hath this millere vernysshed his heed;
Ful pale he was fordronken, and nat reed.
Chaucer, Reeve's Tale, l. 229.

The iron parts are varnished, either with a fat varnish or the residuum of some turpentine varnish.
Workshop Receipts, 1st ser., p. 234.

2. To cover with something that gives a fair external appearance; give an improved appearance to.

A wither'd hermit, five-score winters worn,
Might shake off fifty, looking in her eye:
Beauty doth varnish age, as if new-born,
And gives the crutch the cradle's infancy.
Shak., L. L. L., iv. 3. 244.

Close ambition, varnish'd o'er with zeal.
Milton, P. L., ii. 485.

3. To give an attractive external appearance to by rhetoric; give a fair coloring to; gloss over; palliate: as, to varnish errors or deformity.

The Church of Rome hath hitherto practised and doth profess the same adoration to the sign of the cross and neither less nor other than is due unto Christ himself, howsoever they varnish and qualify their sentence.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 65.

Cato's voice was ne'er employ'd
To clear the guilty, and to varnish crimes.
Addison, Cato, ii. 2.

Varnished glaze. See glaze.

II. intrans. To apply varnish, in a general sense.

varnisher (vär′nish-ėr), n. [< varnish + -er[1].] 1. One who varnishes, or whose occupation is to varnish.—2. One who disguises or palliates; one who gives a fair external appearance (to); one who glosses over.

Thou varnisher of fools, and cheat of all the wise.
Pope, Imit. of Earl of Rochester, On Silence.

varnishing-day (vär′nish-ing-dā), n. A day before the opening of a picture exhibition on which exhibitors have the privilege of retouching or varnishing their pictures after they have been placed on the walls.

varnish-polish (vär′nish-pol″ish), n. See polish[1].

varnish-tree (vär′nish-trē), n. Any one of several trees of which the sap or some secretion serves as a lacquer or varnish. The most important of these is the Japan varnish- or lacquer-tree (see lacquer-tree); also of high importance is the black, Burmese, or Martaban varnish-tree, Melanorrhœa usitata, the theetsee of the Burmese, a tree of 50 or 60 feet, yielding on incision a sap of an extremely blistering property which forms a lacquer of very extensive local use (see black varnish, under varnish). In India the marking-nut, or Sylhet varnish-tree, Semecarpus Anacardium, with one or two allied species, yields in its fruit an excellent black varnish, as does Hadestaphylum causticum in its bark. These all belong to the Anacardiaceæ. See Hymenæa.—False varnish-tree, the tree-of-heaven, Ailanthus glandulosa.—Moreton Bay varnish-tree. See Pentaceras.—New Granada varnish-tree, a rubiaceous tree of the Andes, in Peru and the United States of Colombia (formerly New Granada), Elæagia utilis, which secretes in the axils of the stipules a resinous substance employed by the natives as a useful and ornamental varnish.

varnish-wattle (vär'nish-wot'l), n. See wattle.

varrey, n. See varry.

varriated (var'i-ā-ted), a. [Also variated; < varry + -ate[1] + -ed[2].] In her., stepped or battlemented with the merlons or solid projections pointed bluntly, and the crenelles or openings also pointed in the same way, but reversed: from the resemblance of the shapes produced to vair. Also variated, urdé.

Varronian (va-rō'ni-an), a. [< L. Varronianus, < Varro(n-), Varro (see def.).] Pertaining to any one of the name of Varro, especially to the Roman scholar Marcus Terentius Varro (116 to about 27 B. C.).

The "Varronian plays" were the twenty which have come down to us, along with one which has been lost.
Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 93.

varsal (vär'sal), a. A reduction of univarsal for universal. [Colloq.]

I believe there is not such another in the varsal world.
Swift, Polite Conversation, ii.

Every varsal soul in the library were gone to bed.
Scott.

varsity (vär'si-ti), n.; pl. varsities (-tiz). A reduction of univarsity for university: used in English universities, and affected to some extent in American colleges.

'E [Parson] coom'd to the parish wi' lots o' Varsity debt.
Tennyson, Northern Farmer, New Style.

Varsovienne (vär-sō-vi-en'), n. [F., fem. of Varsovien, of or pertaining to Warsaw, < Varsovie (G. Warschau, Pol. Warszawa), Warsaw.] 1. A dance which apparently originated in France about 1853, in imitation of the Polish mazurka, polka, and redowa.—2. Music for such a dance, or in its rhythm, which is triple and rather slow, with strong accent on the first beat of every second measure.

vartabed, vartabet (vär'ta-bed, -bet), n. [Armenian.] In the Armenian Ch., one of an order of clergy, superior to the ordinary priests, whose special function is teaching. The title means 'doctor' or 'teacher.'

Armenia has always been honourably distinguished for the interest the church has taken in education. A distinct order of the hierarchy has indeed been set apart for that purpose; its members are known by the name of Vartabeds. They rank between a Bishop and a Priest.
J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, i. 69.

Varuna (var'ö-nä), n. [< Skt. varuna, a deity (see def.); cf. Gr. οὐρανός, heaven, Uranus: see Uranus.] In Hind. myth., a deity represented in the Vedic hymns as of very great and manifold powers—the guardian of immortality, cherisher of truth, the seizer and punisher of ill-doers, the forgiver of sins, protector of the good, and the like. Latterly he became the god of waters. He is represented later as a white-skinned man, four-armed, riding on a water-monster, generally with a noose in one of his hands and a club in another, with which he seizes and punishes the wicked.

varus[1] (vā'rus), n.; pl. vari (-rī). [NL., < L. vārus, bent, stretched, or grown inward, awry, knock-kneed.] 1. A deformity characterized by inversion of the foot. See talipes varus.—2. A knock-kneed man. The phrase genu varum is employed by medical writers as synonymous with bow-legs, knock-knee being expressed by genu valgum.

3. [cap.] [NL. (Stål, 1865).] A genus of hemipterous insects.—Talipes varus. See talipes.

varus[2] (vā'rus), n. [NL., < L. vārus, a pimple, blotch.] Acne.—Varus comedo, a pimple resulting from retention of the secretion within the sebaceous duct; comedo; blackhead; face-worm.

varveled, varvelled (vär'veld), a. [< varvel-s + -ed[2].] In her., having the rings called varvels attached: said of the leg of a hawk when used as a bearing. Compare belled, and see cut under à la cuisse. Also verveled.

varvels (vär'velz), n. pl. [Also vervels; < OF. vervelles, F. vervelles, varvels for a hawk, prob. same as vervelles, vertevelles, the hinges of a gate, < ML. vertibella, a hinge, dim. of LL. vertibulum, a joint, ML. also a pair of tongs; cf. It. bertovello, a fish-net, also It. dial. bertavel, bertavelle, bertarel, a fish-net, bird-net, = OF. verveil, verveul, verzeul, verveux, F. verveux (ML. vervilium), a fish-net, hoop-net; < L. vertere, turn: see verse[1], vertebra.] In falconry, rings, usually of silver, placed on the legs of a hunting-hawk, on which the owner's name is engraved. See cut under à la cuisse.

vary (vā'ri), v.; pret. and pp. varied, ppr. varying. [< ME. varien, varyen, < OF. (and F.) varier = Sp. Pg. variar = It. variare, < L. variare, tr. change, alter, make different, intr. change, be different, vary, < varius, different, various: see various.] I. trans. 1. To change; alter: as, to vary the conditions of an experiment.

It hath diuerse times also happened that the appellation of some of these people haue come to be varied and changed.
Verstegan, Rest. of Decayed Intelligence (ed. 1628), p. 17.

2. To diversify; modify; relieve from uniformity or monotony.

Once more I'll mark how love can vary wit.
Shak., L. L. L., iv. 3. 100.

God hath here
Varied his bounty so with new delights.
Milton, P. L., v. 431.

3. To change to something else; transmute.

Gods, that never change their state,
Vary oft their love and hate.
Waller, To Phyllis.

We are to vary the customs according to the time and the country where the scene of action lies.
Dryden, Parallel of Poetry and Painting.

4. To make of different kinds; make diverse or different one from another.—5†. To express variously; diversify in terms or forms of expression.

The man hath no wit that cannot, from the rising of the lark to the lodging of the lamb, vary deserved praise on my palfry. Shak., Hen. V., iii. 7. 35.

6. In music, to embellish or alter (a melody or theme) without really changing its identity. See variation, 9.

II. intrans. 1. To alter or be altered in any manner; suffer a partial change; appear in different or various forms; be modified; be changeable.

Fortune's mood
Varies again. Shak., Pericles, iii., Prol.

Who can believe what varies every day,
Nor ever was nor will be at a stay?
Dryden, Hind and Panther, ii. 36.

2. To differ or be different; be unlike or diverse: as, the laws of different countries vary.

Zif alle it so be, that Men of Grece ben Cristene, zit they varien from oure Feithe. Mandeville, Travels, p. 18.

She that varies from me in belief Gives great presumption that she loves me not.
Marlowe, Jew of Malta, iii. 4.

I have not been curious as to the spelling of the Names of Places, Plants, Fruits, Animals, &c., which in many of the remoter parts are given at the pleasure of Travellers, and vary according to their different Humours.
Dampier, Voyages, I., Pref.

While fear and anger, with alternate grace,
Pant in her breast, and vary in her face.
Addison, Cato, iii. 7.

6. To disagree; be at variance.

In judgement of her substance thus they vary,
And thus they vary in judgement of her seat;
For some her chair up to the brain do carry,
Some thrust it down into the stomach's heat.
Sir J. Davies, Immortal. of Soul.

7†. To turn out otherwise.

Anhonged be swich oon, were he my brother!
And so he shal, for it ne may noght varyen.
Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 1621.

8. In math. analysis, to be subject to continual increase or decrease: as, a quantity conceived to vary, or have different values in the same equation. One quantity is said to vary directly as another when if the one is increased or diminished the other increases or diminishes in some definite proportion. Quantities vary inversely when if one is increased or diminished the other is proportionally diminished or increased.

9. In biol., to be diversified or subject to variation, as by natural or artificial selection; exhibit variation. See variability, 2, variation, 8, and variety, 6.—Varying hare. See hare[1], 1.

vary† (vā'ri), n. [< vary, v.] Alteration; change; variation.

Renege, affirm, and turn their halcyon beaks
With every gale and vary of their masters.
Shak., Lear, ii. 2. 85.

vary-colored (vā'ri-kul'ord), a. An erroneous ★spelling of varicolored.

vas (vas), n.; pl. vasa (vā'sä). [< L. vas, a vessel: see vase, vessel.] In anat. and zoöl., a vasculum or vessel, as a tube, duct, or conduit conveying blood, lymph, or other fluid.—Vasa aberrantia. (a) Long slender arteries which occasionally connect the brachial or the axillary artery with one of the arteries of the forearm, usually the radial. (b) The aberrant ducts of the testis. See aberrant. (c) Bile-ducts running an unusual course in the liver.—Vasa afferentia, the afferent vessels of a lymphatic gland; the small branches into which a lymphatic or lacteal vessel divides before entering a gland.—Vasa ambulacralia cava, hollow ambulacral vessels; certain diverticula or cæcal prolongations of the Polian vesicles and ambulacral ring in echinoderms.—Vasa brevia. (a) The gastric branches of the splenic artery: five to seven small branches distributed to the fundus and greater curvature of the stomach. (b) Tributaries to the splenic vein, corresponding to the arterial vasa brevia.—Vasa centralia, the central vessels (artery and vein) of the optic nerve.—Vasa chylifera. Same as vasa lactea.—Vasa efferentia. (a) The efferent tubules of the testis: from twelve to twenty ducts which receive the seminal fluid from the vessels of the rete testis, and transmit it to the epididymis, forming in their course convoluted conical masses, the coni vasculosi, which together constitute the globus major. (b) The efferent lymphatic vessels: usually small ones, that soon unite into a larger one.—Vasa Graafiana. Same as vasa efferentia (a).—Vasa inferentia. Same as vasa afferentia.—Vasa intestinæ tenuis, from twelve to fifteen slender branches of the superior mesenteric artery, distributed to the jejunum and ileum.—Vasa lactea, the lacteals; the small chyliferous vessels of the intestine.—Vasa lymphatica, lymphatic vessels. See cuts under lymphatic.—Vasa recta, the straight tubules of the testis: from twenty to thirty short ducts formed by the union of the seminiferous tubules, and discharging into the vessels of the rete testis.—Vasa vasorum, small blood-vessels supplying the walls of other larger vessels.—Vasa vorticosa, the veins of the outer part of the choroid coat of the eye, which converge from all directions to form four or five principal trunks.—Vas deferens, the excretory duct of the testis, or its equivalent. In man it is a continuation of the epididymis, beginning at the lower part of the globus minor, and ascending with the spermatic cord through the inguinal ring to the base of the bladder, where it becomes enlarged and sacculated, and finally unites with the duct of the vesicula seminalis to form the ejaculatory duct. It is about two feet in length, being greatly convoluted, and an eighth of an inch in diameter. The duct which receives this name in various animals differs greatly in anatomical character. See cuts under Trematoda, Astacidæ, and germarium.—Vas deferens mulieris, a Fallopian tube.—Vas prominens, the spirally running vessel in the accessory spiral ligament of the cochlea.—Vas spirale, a small blood-vessel of the cochlea, situated opposite the outer rods of Corti, on the under surface of the basilar membrane.

Vasa (vā'sä), n. In ornith., same as Vaza.

vasal (vā'sal), a. Pertaining to a vas or vessel; especially, pertaining to the blood-vessels.

vasalium (vā-sā'li-um), n.; pl. vasalia (-ä). [NL.: see vas.] Vascular tissue proper; endothelium; cœlarium; the epithelium-like layer of cells or vascular carpet which lines the closed cavities of the body, such as the serous surfaces of the thorax, abdomen, and pericardium, and the interior of the heart, arteries, veins, and other vessels.

vascula, n. Plural of vasculum.

vascular (vas'kū-lär), a. [= F. vasculaire = Sp. Pg. vascular = It. vasculare, vascolare, < NL. vascularis*, < L. vasculum, a small vessel: see vasculum.] 1. In anat. and zoöl.: (a) Of or pertaining to vessels which convey fluids; of or pertaining to the conveyance or circulation of fluids, especially blood, lymph, and chyle; circulatory: as, the vascular system; a vascular function or action. Some vascular systems are specified as blood-vascular, lymph-vascular, and water-vascular. See also chylaqueous.

Remotely dependent, however, as the genesis of motion is on digestive, vascular, respiratory, and other structures, and immediately dependent as it is on contractile structures, its most important dependence remains to be named: . . . the initiator or primary generator of motion is the Nervous System. H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 2.

The machinery of circulation is two sets of vessels—the hæmatic, or vascular system proper, consisting of the heart, arteries, veins, and capillaries for the blood-circulation; and the lymphatic, consisting of lymph-hearts and vessels, for the flow of lymph. . . . Those tissues whose capillaries are large enough for the passage of all the constituents of the blood are said to be vascular; those which only feed by sucking up certain constituents of the blood, and have no demonstrable capillaries, are called non-vascular. Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 195.

(b) Containing vessels for the circulation of fluids; especially, well provided with small blood-vessels: as, muscle and bone are very vascular tissues; cartilage and cuticle are non-vascular; a vascular tumor.—2. In bot.: (a) Consisting of, relating to, or furnished with vessels or ducts: applied to the tissues of plants that are composed of or furnished with elongated cells or vessels for the circulation of sap. (b) Of or pertaining to the higher or phanerogamous plants, these uniformly containing more or less clearly defined vessels or ducts.—Vascular arches. See visceral arches, under visceral.—Vascular cake, the placenta. [Rare.]—Vascular centers, the centers in the medulla and spinal cord which are supposed to control dilatation and contraction of the blood-vessels.—Vascular cryptogams, cryptogams in which the tissues consist more or less of true vascular tissue. These are coextensive with the Pteridophyta, or so-called higher cryptogams.—Vascular ganglions or glands. See gland.—Vascular glomerulus. See glomerulus.—Vascular plants, plants in which the structure is made up in part of vascular tissue or vessels. They compose the Spermatophyta, or ordinary flowering plants, and the Pteridophyta, or vascular cryptogams (see above): sometimes technically called Vasculares (which see).—Vascular stimulant, a remedy which accelerates the flow of blood through the vessels.—Vascular system. See def. 1 and system.—Vascular tissue. (a) Any tissue permeated with blood-vessels, or other vessels large enough to convey blood-disks or lymph-corpuscles. (b) See vasalium. (c) In bot., tissue composed of vessels or ducts; the fibrovascular system.—Vascular tonic, a remedy which causes contraction of the finer blood-vessels.—Vascular tumor. (a) An aneurism. (b) A tumor composed chiefly of an agglomeration of dilated terminal blood-vessels. (c) A tumor which contains an abnormally large number of blood-vessels, bleeding profusely on the slightest injury. (d†) Bleeding internal hemorrhoids.—Water-vascular system. See water-vascular.

Vasculares (vas-kū-lā′rēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. vascularis, vascular: see vascular.] In De Candolle's system of classification (1818), a name given to that division of the vegetable kingdom more usually called Phanerogamia or Phænogamia (Spermatophyta), including also the Pteridophyta, or ferns and their allies, and so named from the presence of vascular tissue, which is wanting in all lower cryptogams.

vascularity (vas-kū-lar′i-ti), n. [< vascular + -ity.] The character or condition of being vascular.

vascularization (vas″kū-lär-i-zā′shon), n. [< vascularize + -ation.] The process of becoming vascular, as by the formation of new blood-vessels.

vascularize (vas′kū-lär-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. vascularized, ppr. vascularizing. [< vascular + -ize.] To render vascular. Micros. Science, XXXI. 168.

vascularly (vas′kū-lär-li), adv. So as to be vascular; by means of vessels; as regards the vascular system.

> The conclusion is drawn that "multiple buds, one springing from another and being vascularly connected therewith, ought to be considered as normal ramifications." Nature, XLII. 216.

vasculiform (vas′kū-li-fôrm), a. [< L. vasculum, a small vessel, + forma, form.] In bot., having the form of a vessel like a flower-pot.

vasculomotor (vas′kū-lō-mō″tọr), a. [< L. vasculum, a small vessel, + motor, mover.] Same as vasomotor.

vasculose (vas′kū-lōs), a. and n. [= F. vasculeux = Sp. vasculoso = It. vascoloso, < NL. vasculosus*, < L. vasculum, a small vessel: see vasculum.] I. a. Same as vascular.

II. n. In chem., the substance constituting the principal part of the vessels of plants.

vasculum (vas′kū-lum), n.; pl. vascula (-lä). [NL., < L. vasculum, a small vessel, the seed-capsule of certain plants, LL. also a small bee-hive, dim. of L. vas, a vessel: see vase, vessel.] 1. A botanist's case or box for carrying specimens as he collects them. It is usually made of tin, and is about 18 inches long, oval-cylindrical in cross-section, being 6 inches wide and 4 inches deep, with a simple cover opening for nearly the whole length.

2. In bot., same as ascidium, 2.—3. In anat.: ★(a) A small vessel; a vas. (b) The penis.

vase (vās or väz), n. [Formerly also vause, earlier as L., in the pl. vasa, used with added E. pl., vasa's; = D. vaas = G. vase = Dan. vase = Sw. vas, < F. vase, OF. vase, vaze = Sp. Pg. vaso = It. vase, vaso, < L. vas, also vasum (rarely vasus), pl. vasa, neut., a vessel, also an implement or utensil, pl. equipments, baggage; cf. Skt. vasana, a receptacle, box, basket, jar, vāsas, a garment, < √ vas, put on, clothe (cover): see vest and wear[1]. Hence ult. vessel, extravasate. According to the F. pron. (väz), and to the time when the word vase appears to have been taken into E. (between 1660 and 1700), the reg. E. pron. would be vāz, with a tendency to make it conform to the apparent analogy of base, case, etc.—that is, to pronounce it vās. At the same time, the recency of the word, and its association with art, have tended to encourage the attempts to pronounce it as F., namely väz, in the 18th century absurdly rendered also as vâz, the word being found accordingly in the spelling vause. In the latter part of the 18th century the word was pronounced vās by Sheridan, Scott, Kenrick, Perry, Buchanan, vāz by Walker (who says he has "uniformly heard it pronounced" so), Smith, Johnston, and vâz by Elphinston, the last pronunciation, vâz, being used, according to Walker, "sometimes by people of refinement; but this, being too refined for the general ear, is now but seldom heard" (though Ellis says (in 1874) that it is the most familiar to him). The pron. väz, now affected by many, is a more successful attempt to imitate the present F. pronunciation. In the 18th century the sound ä in foreign words, except before r, was almost always rendered â by English speakers (cf. spa, often written spaw, pron. spâ, G. ja, written yaw (yâ), etc.).] 1. A hollow vessel, generally high in proportion to its horizontal diameter, and decorative in character and purpose. The term is sometimes restricted to such vessels when made without covers and without handles, or with two equal and symmetrical handles; but in the widest sense, as in speaking of Greek and other ancient vases, vessels of any form whatever are included. As a branch of art development, by far the most important production of vases was that of the ancient Greeks during the creative period of their art history, for many centuries previous to 200 B. C. The greater part of the Greek vases are in fine pottery, unglazed, and decorated with monochrome and outline designs in simple pigments. They are notable not only for the great beauty and appropriateness of much of the decoration, but for the supreme elegance, unattained among other peoples, of a large proportion of the forms. These Greek vases were in actual use in antiquity, not only as ornaments, but as utensils for the various purposes in every-day life. See Greek art (under Greek) and vase-painting, and the cuts under the names of the different forms of vases, as amphora, crater, hydria, oxybaphon, prochoös, stamnos.

Vase.—Greek Apodal Dinos, with its stand, of late black-figured style. Found at Orvieto. Total height, in stand, 22¼ inches. In Museum of Fine Arts, Boston.

> Here were large Iron Vasa's upon Pedestals, the first I had seen of the Kind, painted over of a Copper colour.
> Lister, Journey to Paris, p. 188.

> His [Nost's] widow also sold [in 1712] . . . "the fine Marble Figures and Busts, curious inlaid Marble Tables, Brass and Leaden Figures, and very rich Vauses."
> J. Ashton, Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, II. 49.

> And, as he fill'd the reeking vase,
> Let fly a rouser in her face.
> Swift, Strephon and Chloe, p. 10.

> There heroes' wits are kept in pond'rous vases,
> And beaux' in snuff-boxes and tweezer-cases.
> Pope, R. of the L., v. 254.

> A pure, transparent, pale, yet radiant face,
> Like to a lighted alabaster vase.
> Byron, Don Juan, viii. 96.

Hence—2. An object designed usually for ornament, but sometimes for other specific purposes, having somewhat the form and appearance of the vessel in the primary sense. Such vases are often made of marble, or of metal, in an antique or pseudo-antique form, and are used to hold flowers, to decorate gate-posts, monuments, and the like, or are placed on a socle or pedestal, or in a range on an architectural parapet, façade, or frontispiece. Compare cut under affix.

> Timbs says the Lincoln's Inn Fields house has a handsome stone front, and had formerly vases upon the open balustrade. N. and Q., 7th ser., V. 343.

3. The body of the Corinthian and Composite capital: sometimes called tambour or drum.—Acoustic vase. See acoustic.—Alhambra vase, a large vase at the Alhambra near Granada, belonging to the fourteenth century, and the finest specimen known of the ware of Malaga.—Bacchic vase. See Bacchic.—Barberini vase. Same as Portland vase.—Borghese vase, a large Greco-Roman vase of white marble with bas-reliefs representing the thiasus of Bacchus, preserved in the Louvre Museum.—Canopic vases. See Canopic.—Dionysiac vase. Same as Bacchic vase.—Encaustic vase. See encaustic.—Etruscan vases, a former mistaken name for Greek decorated pottery, due to the discovery in Etrurian tombs, in the seventeenth century and later, of the first examples of these vases to attract attention in modern times.—Mandarin vases. See mandarin.—Peg-top vase. See peg-top.—Pilgrim's vase. See pilgrim.—Portland vase, a remarkable example of Greco-Roman cameo-glass with reliefs in opaque white glass upon a ground of dark blue, of somewhat doubtful subject, but interpreted as having reference to the myth of Peleus and Thetis. This vase, which is 9¾ inches high, is preserved in the British Museum. Also called Barberini vase. See cut in preceding column.—Profumiera vase, a vase for perfumes, arranged with openings in the cover through which the fragrance can issue.—Temple vase. See temple[1].—Triple vase, a group of three vases, united by bands of the same material, or by being in contact at the lips or otherwise. Such vases are often sharply pointed, so that one could not stand alone.—Tripod vase. See tripod.—Unguentary vase. See unguentary.—Vase à jacinthe, an ornamental vase to which are attached upon its sides or cover receptacles for bulbs of a flowering plant, as the hyacinth, the spikes of the flowers seeming to form part of the design of the vase.—Vase of a theater, in anc. arch., same as acoustic vase.—Vase of Mithridates, of Ptolemy, or of St. Denis, a vase of agate with carved ornament of Bacchic character, preserved in the treasury of the Abbey of St. Denis, to which it was presented by Carloman. It was brought from Italy by Charlemagne, and according to tradition belonged to Ptolemy XI., the father of Cleopatra, and to Mithridates, king of Pontus.

The Portland Vase.—From photograph of the replica by Wedgwood.

vase-clock (vās′klok), n. A timepiece having the general form of a vase. In the eighteenth century some clocks were made which told the time by means of two rings, set one upon another and revolving at different rates of speed, the one for the hours, the other for the minutes. Such rings were combined with the body of a vase, so as to form part of its decoration.

vaseful (vās′fûl), n. [< vase + -ful.] The quantity that a vase will contain.

> This [prostration] was followed by a cup of holy water and a present to the Sakkas, or carriers, who for the consideration distributed a large earthen vaseful in my name to poor pilgrims. R. F. Burton, El-Medinah, p. 391.

vaseline (vas′e-lin), n. [So named by the proprietor of the article; irreg. < G. was(ser), water, + Gr. ἔλ(αιον), oil, + -ine[2].] Same as petrolatum. It is a semi-fluid, viscid, nearly colorless, bland, and neutral material, and is used in medicine and surgery as a vehicle.

vase-painting (vās′pān″ting), n. The decoration of vases with pigments of any kind, especially the decoration of the pottery of the ancient Greeks, which, unless exceptionally, was executed in monochrome tints and outlines in unvitrifiable pigments. It is the most important of the minor arts of ancient Greece. From the variety and domesticity of the subjects treated, Greek vase-painting is of the greatest importance for the light shed by it upon every phase of ancient life; and from the art side it is equally valuable, not only from the fine decorative and creative quality which it frequently shows, but from the information which it supplies regarding the great art of Greek painting, which has perished. The work bears something the relation to the great art that is borne by the comic and other illustrated prints to the painting of the present day. Historically, after the very ancient kindred styles of Asia Minor, the Ægean Islands, and the mainland of Greece (as at Mycenæ and Sparta), in which the rude ornament is geometric, or based on plants and animals, usually marine, with occasional admission of human figures, Greek vase-painting may be subdivided into four styles. (1) The Dipylon or early Attic style, so called because the first examples recognized were found near the Dipylon gate in Athens. The ornament is largely geometric, with bands of slim and grotesque men and animals, the design becoming freer with the advance of time. (2) The Corinthian style, in which the characteristic feature is the superposition of bands of animals and monsters, with rosettes and elaborate flowered and fringed borders, the whole following very closely the Assyrian and Phrygian embroideries, which were abundantly imported into Greece at this early time. (See cut under Corinthian.) The earliest distinctively Cypriote vases blend the characteristics of the Dipylon and Corinthian styles. (3) The black-figured style, which, though archaic and often rude, has become thoroughly Hellenic. The ornament is in general black on a ground of the natural color of the pottery, which is most often dull red, sometimes yellow or gray. Some details of dress, etc., are put in purplish red; the flesh of female figures is commonly painted in white; occasionally bright red, dull green, and yellow are introduced. (4) The red-figured or final style, which was developed early in the fifth century B. C., and continued until vase-painting was practically abandoned, about 200 B. C. It embraces the period of transition from the archaic, to which belong some of the first masters among vase-painters, and is by far the most important for study. In this style a tendency toward polychromy appears occasionally, but was not consistently worked out, except in the small but admirable class of Attic funeral lecythi. In some elaborate pieces of the fourth and third centuries, chiefly Attic, gilding is sparingly introduced. The style implies the presence of figures and of ornamental designs of every kind, very commonly in bands or zones running around the vase, in which the design appears in the natural red of the clay, details being indicated in simple black lines, and the ground being covered with solid glossy black. For examples of the red-figured decoration, see cuts under Greek and Poseidon.

Vasidæ (vas'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Vasum + -idæ.] A family of gastropods, named from the genus Vasum: same as Turbinellidæ.

vasifactive (vas-i-fak'tiv), a. [< L. vas, vessel, + factus, pp. of facere, make (see fact), + -ive.] Causing a new formation of blood-vessels; angioplastic. Micros. Sci., N. S., XXX. 313.

vasiform (vas'i-fôrm), a. [< L. vas, vessel, + forma, form.] Having the form of a duct or other vessel; of the nature of a vas or vasculum; tubular.—Vasiform elements, in plants, the elements, such as vessels, ducts, etc., which make up the vascular tissue.—Vasiform tissue, tissue made up wholly or in part of vessels or ducts.

Vasinæ, Vasina (vā-sī'nē, -nä), n. pl. [NL., < Vasum + -inæ, -ina.] A subfamily of gastropods: same as Cynodontinæ.

vasoconstrictive (vas″ō-kon-strik'tiv), a. [< L. vas, vessel, + E. constrictive.] Same as vasoconstrictor. W. James, Prin. of Psychol., I. 97.

vasoconstrictor (vas″ō-kon-strik'tor), a. and n. [< L. vas, vessel, + E. constrictor.] I. a. Serving to constrict vessels when stimulated, as certain nerves: opposed to vasodilator. Both are included under vasomotor.

II. n. That which causes contraction of the blood-vessels: applied to nerves and to certain drugs.

vasodentinal (vas-ō-den'ti-nal), a. [< vasodentine + -al.] Pertaining to or having the character of vasodentine.

vasodentine (vas-ō-den'tin), n. [< L. vas, a vessel, + den(t-)s, = E. tooth, + *-ine*2.] A vascular form of dentine in which blood circulates; dentine whose capillaries are large enough for the passage of red blood-disks. Compare osteodentine and vitriodentine.

vasodilator (vas″ō-di-lā'tor), a. and n. [< L. vas, vessel, + E. dilator.] I. a. Serving to dilate or relax blood-vessels when stimulated, as a nerve. See vasomotor.

II. n. That which causes dilatation of the blood-vessels: applied to nerves and certain drugs.

vasoformative (vas-ō-fôr'ma-tiv), a. [< L. vas, vessel, + E. formative.] Forming or building up vessels, usually blood-vessels; vasifactive.

vasoganglion (vas-ō-gang'gli-on), n.; pl. vasoganglia (-ä). [< L. vas, vessel, + E. ganglion.] A network or knot of vessels; a vascular rete.

vaso-inhibitory (vas″ō-in-hib'i-tō-ri), a. [< L. vas, vessel, + E. inhibitory.] Relating to the nerve-force causing dilatation of the blood-vessels. See inhibitory.

vasomotion (vas-ō-mō'shon), n. [< L. vas, vessel, + E. motion.] Increase or diminution of the caliber of a vessel, usually a blood-vessel.

vasomotor (vas-ō-mō'tor), a. [< L. vas, vessel, + E. motor.] Serving to regulate the tension of blood-vessels, as nerves; vasomotorial, whether vasoconstrictor or vasodilator. Compare inhibition, 3. Also vasculomotor.—Vasomotor center. Same as vascular center. See vascular.—Vasomotor coryza, a name given, in accordance with a theoretical pathology, to autumnal catarrh, or hay-fever. N. Y. Med. Jour., Sept. 3, 1887.—Vasomotor nerves, the nerves supplied to the muscular coat of the blood-vessels.—Vasomotor spasm, spasm of the middle coat of the blood-vessels.

vasomotorial (vas″ō-mō-tō'ri-al), a. [< vasomotory + -al.] Pertaining to the vasomotor function; vasomotor.

vasomotoric (vas″ō-mō-tor'ik), a. [< vasomotor + -ic.] Same as vasomotorial.

vasomotory (vas-ō-mō'tō-ri), a. [< vasomotor + *-y*1.] Same as vasomotorial. Lancet, 1891, I. 370.

vasoperitoneal (vas-ō-per″i-tō-nē'al), a. [< L. vas, vessel, + E. peritoneal.] In echinoderms, noting the shut sac which results from the cutting off from the archenteron of a cæcal diverticulum to which the anterior part of that cavity gives rise. The vesicle subsequently opens on the exterior by a pore, through a diverticulum from itself, and divides later into two sections—an ambulacral sac, which lays the foundation for the whole ambulacral system of vessels, and a peritoneal sac, which gives rise to the peritoneum (whence the name).

vasosensory (vas-ō-sen'sō-ri), a. [< L. vas, vessel, + E. sensory.] Supplying sensation to the vessels: applied to sensory nerves corresponding to the vasomotor nerves.

vasquine (vas-kēn'), n. Same as basquine. Scott, Abbot, II. 151.

vassal (vas'al), n. and a. [Formerly also vassall, rarely vassaile; < ME. vassal, < OF. vassal, F. vassal = Pr. vassal, vassau = Cat. vassal = Sp. vasallo = Pg. It. vassallo = D. vassaal = G. Sw. vasall = Dan. vasal, < ML. vassallus, extended from vassus, vasus, a servant, < Bret. gwaz, a servant, vassal, man, male, = W. gwas = Corn. gwas, a youth, servant; cf. Ir. fas, growing, growth, and E. *wax*1. Hence ult. varlet, valet, vassalage, vavasor.] I. n. 1. A feudatory tenant; one holding lands by the obligation to render military service or its equivalent to his superior, especially in contradistinction to rear vassal and vavasor; a vassal of the first order—that is, one holding directly from the king. Compare great vassal, below.

The two earls . . . complained of the misrepresentations of their enemies and the oppression of their vassals, and alleged that the cause of their flight was not dread of those enemies, but fear of God and the king.
Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 353.

A Vassal or Vasseur was the holder or grantee of a feud under a prince or sovereign lord.
W. K. Sullivan, Introd. to O'Curry's Anc. Irish, p. ccxxvi.

2. A subject; a dependent; a retainer; a servant; one who attends on or does the will of another.

Passions ought to be her [the mind's] vassals, not her masters. Raleigh.

I am his fortune's vassal. Shak., A. and C., v. 2. 29.

I desire not to live longer than I may be thought to be what I am, and shall ever be your faithful and obedient Vassal. Baker, Chronicles, p. 164.

3. A bondman; a slave.

Let such vile vassals, borne to base vocation,
Drudge in the world, and for their living droyle,
Which have no wit to live withouten toyle.
Spenser, Mother Hub. Tale, l. 156.

Not vassals to be beat, nor pretty babes
To be dandled—no, but living wills.
Tennyson, Princess, iv.

Men's thoughts and opinions are in a great degree vassals of him who invents a new phrase or reapplies an old epithet. Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 326.

4. A low wretch.

Obdurate vassals fell exploits effecting.
Shak., Lucrece, l. 429.

Great vassal, under the feudal system, one who held lands directly from the sovereign without intermediary. —Rear vassal, under the feudal system, a vassal of the second degree—that is, one who held land from a great vassal.

II. a. Servile; subservient.

Silver golde in price doth follow,
Because from him, as Cynthia from Apollo,
She takes her light, & other mettals all
Are but his vassaile starres.
Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 41.

Thy proud heart's slave and vassal wretch to be.
Shak., Sonnets, cxli.

vassal (vas'al), v. t.; pret. and pp. vassaled, vassalled, ppr. vassaling, vassalling. [< vassal, n.] 1. To subject to vassalage; enslave; treat as a vassal.

How am I vassal'd then?
Beau. and Fl., Four Plays in One.

2. To command; rise over or above; dominate.

Some proud hill, whose stately eminence
Vassals the fruitfull vale's circumference.
W. Browne, Britannia's Pastorals, i. 4.

vassalage (vas'al-āj), n. [Formerly also vassallage, vassellage; < ME. vassalage, vasselage, < OF. vasselage, vasalage, vasselaige, the service of a vassal, prowess, valor, also vassalage, F. vasselage = Pr. vassalatge, vasselatge = Sp. vasallaje = Pg. vassallagem = It. vassallaggio, vassalage; as vassal + -age.] 1. The state of being a vassal or feudatory; hence, the obligations of that state; the service required of a vassal.

I protest I shall be proud to do you most obsequious vassalage. Marston, What you Will, ii. 1.

2. Servitude; dependence; subjection; slavery.

Do you think that all they who live under a Kingly Government were so strangely in love with Slavery as, when they might be free, to chuse Vassalage?
Milton, Ans. to Salmasius, vii.

But, slave to love, I must not disobey;
His service is the hardest vassalage.
Farquhar, Love and a Bottle, iii. 1.

Vatican (vat'i-kan), n. [= F. Vatican = Sp. Pg. It. Vaticano, < L. Vaticanus, sc. mons or collis, the Vatican hill in Rome (see def.).] The palace of the Popes, a mass of buildings of vast extent, built upon the Vatican hill, immediately to the north of the basilica of St. Peter at Rome. Since the close of the papal schism (about 1418) the Vatican has been the principal residence of the Popes, and since the conversion of Rome into the capital of Italy (1870) officially their only residence. As such, and as the storehouse of priceless literary and artistic collections, it is one of the chief treasuries of Rome and of the world. Hence, the Vatican is used as equivalent to the papal power or government: as in the phrase the thunders of the Vatican, the anathemas or denunciations of the Pope. The Vatican is also in familiar use as a designation for the museums of sculpture and painting which are there aggregated.—Vatican Codex. See codex, 2.—Vatican Council, the Twentieth Ecumenical Council according to the reckoning of the Church of Rome, which met in the Vatican December 8th, 1869, and declared belief in the infallibility of the Pope when speaking ex cathedra to be a dogma of the church. It was closed October 20th, 1870, owing to the occupation of Rome by the civil power of Italy. See infallibility, and Old Catholic (under catholic).—Vatican Fragments, parts of a compendium of law taken from the writings of jurisconsults and from several imperial constitutions. vauter†, n. An obsolete form of vaulter.

vauty†, a. A variant of vaulty.

vavasor, vavasour (vav'a-sọr, -sör), n. [Also vavassor, valvasor; ME. vavasour, < OF. vavassour, F. vavasseur, < ML. vassus vassorum, vassal of vassals: vassus, vassal; vassorum, gen. pl. of vassus, vassal.] In feudal law, a principal vassal not holding immediately of the sovereign, but of a great lord, and having other vassals holding of him; a vassal of the second degree or rank. In the class of vavasors were comprehended châtelains (castellans), who owned castles or fortified houses, and possessed rights of territorial justice. In England the title was rarely used, though Camden defines it as next to baron, while Chaucer applies it to his Frankeleyn. [Obsolete or archaic.]

A Frankeleyn was in his compaignye; . . .
Was nowher such a worthy vavasour.
Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 360.

Lord, liegeman, valvassor, and suzerain,
Ere he could choose, surrounded him.
Browning, Sordello.

Veatchia (vē'chi-ä), n. [NL. (Asa Gray, 1884), named after Dr. John A. Veatch, who discovered the Cerros Island trees.] An untenable name for Pachycormus, a genus of trees, of the family Anacardiaceæ. It is distinguished from the related genus Rhus (the sumac) by its valvate sepals, accrescent petals, and thin-walled fruit. The only species, Pachycormus discolor (Schinus discolor of Bentham), a native of Lower California, both on the mainland and on Cerros Island, is known as elephant-tree, from the thick heavy trunk and branches (often 2 feet thick and not more than the same height, sending out ponderous bent and tortuous horizontal branches often 20 feet long, and ending suddenly in short twigs loaded with bright-pink or yellowish-gray flowers). The trees usually grow close together, often forming low and impenetrable mats. On the mainland the species becomes erect and sometimes 25 feet high, and is locally known as copal-quien. Its bark is there used in tanning leather. The outer bark is a brown skin, peeling annually, and increasing the resemblance to the elephant. The flowers appear after the fall of the minute leaves, and where the trees are grouped in masses form a blaze of color visible for several miles.

veck† (vek), n. [ME. vecke, vekke; origin obscure.] An old woman.

A rympled vekke, ferre ronne in age.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 4495.

Their enervated lords are lolling in their chariots (a species of vectitation seldom used amongst the ancients except by old men). Martinus Scriblerus.

★vector (vek'tọr), n. and a. [= F. vecteur, < L. vector, one who carries or conveys, < vehere, pp. vectus, carry, convey: see vection.] I. n. 1. (a) In quaternions, a quantity which, being added to any point of space, gives as the sum that point which is at a certain distance in a certain direction from the first. Vectors are said to be equal when their directions and magnitudes are the same. Unit vectors in quaternions are considered as equivalent to quadrantal versors having their axes in the directions of vectors; the word vector has accordingly sometimes, but incorrectly, been used in the sense of a quadrantal versor. Every quaternion can be resolved in one way, and one way only, into a sum of a scalar and a vector; and this vector is called the vector of the quaternion, and is denoted by writing V before the sign of the quaternion. Thus, Vq denotes the vector of the quaternion q. Hence—(b) A directive quantity; a quantity determined by two numbers giving its direction and a third giving its magnitude.—2. Same as radius vector. See radius.—Addition of vectors. See addition.—Origin of a vector. See origin.

II. a. Of the nature of or concerned with vectors.—Vector analysis, the algebra of vectors.—Vector equation, an equation between vectors.—Vector function. See function.—Vector potential, a vector quantity so distributed throughout space that the result of operating upon it by the Hamiltonian operator ★represents some natural quantity.

vectorial (vek-tō'ri-al), a. [< vector + -ial.] Of or pertaining to a vector or vectors.—Vectorial coördinates. See coördinate.

vecture† (vek'tūr), n. [= F. voiture = It. vettura, a carriage, < L. vectura, a carrying, transportation, < vehere, pp. vectus, carry: see vection.] A carrying; carriage; conveyance by carrying. Bacon, Seditions and Troubles (ed. 1887).

Veda (vā'dä), n. [= F. véda = G. Veda, < Skt. veda, lit. knowledge, understanding, esp. sacred knowledge, the Hindu scripture, < √ vid, know, = E. wit: see wit[1].] The sacred scripture of the ancient Hindus, written in an older form or dialect of Sanskrit. It is divided into mantra, or sacred utterance (chiefly metrical), brāhmana, or inspired exposition, and sūtra, or sacrificial rules. It is also divided into four bodies of writings: Rig-Veda or hymns, Sāma-Veda or chants, Yajur-Veda or sacred formulas, and Atharva-Veda, a collection of later and more superstitious hymns—each with its brāhmanas and sūtras. It is of unknown and very uncertain chronology, the oldest of the hymns being possibly from near 2000 B. C. Sometimes abbreviated Ved.

Vedalia (vē-dā'li-ạ), n. [NL. (Mulsant, 1851).] 1. A genus of Coccinellidæ, containing about 6 species of ladybird beetles of predaceous habits, natives of subtropical regions. V. cardinalis, an Australian form, was imported by the United States Department of Agriculture from Australia and New Zealand into California in the winter of 1888–9 to destroy the fluted scale (Icerya purchasi), which result it accomplished in less than nine months, through its rapacity and remarkable fecundity.

2. [l. c.] Any member of this genus: as, the cardinal vedalia (the species above mentioned).

Vedanga (vā-däng'gạ), n. [Skt. vedanga, < veda, Veda, + anga, limb.] In lit., a limb of the Veda. This name is given to certain Sanskrit works auxiliary to the Vedas, and aiding to the understanding of them and their application to specific purposes. The Vedangas are elaborate treatises on (1) pronunciation, (2) meter, (3) grammar, (4) explanation of difficult terms, (5) astronomy, (6) ceremonial. They are composed in the sūtra or aphoristic style.

Vedanta (vā-dän'tạ), n. [< Skt. Veda, knowledge, + anta, end: see Veda.] A system of philosophy among the Hindus, founded on the Vedas. It is chiefly concerned in the investigation of the Supreme Spirit and the relation in which the universe, and especially the human soul, stands to it.

II. n. 1. A plant. See plant[1].—2. In a more limited sense, a herbaceous plant used wholly or in part for culinary purposes, or for feeding cattle, sheep, or other animals, as cabbage, cauliflower, turnips, potatoes, spinach, peas, and beans. The whole plant may be so used, or its tops or leaves, or its roots, tubers, etc., or its fruit or seed.

> Sowthistle, dandelion, and lettuce are their favourite vegetables, especially the last.
> Cowper, Account of his Hares, May 28, 1784.

Chattel vegetable. See chattel.—Leather vegetable, a shrubby West Indian plant, Euphorbia punicea: so named from its coriaceous leaves. The flower-cluster has long scarlet bracts.=Syn. Vegetable, Plant, Herb, Tree, Shrub, Bush, Undershrub, Vine. Vegetable and plant in scientific use alike denote any member whatever of the vegetable kingdom. In popular use a vegetable is a culinary herb, and a plant is comparatively small, either an herb, or a shrub or tree when quite young, particularly a cultivated herb. An herb is a plant without a woody stem, hence dying to the root, or throughout, each year. A tree is a plant having a woody aërial stem, typically single below and branching above, the whole with a height of not less than four or five times the human stature. A shrub is a woody plant, typically lower than a tree and branching near or below the ground. A bush is a shrub of medium size, forming a clump of stems, or at least of a branching habit. An undershrub is a very small shrub. A vine is an herb, shrub, or even tree, with a long and slender stem which is not self-supporting. See the several words.

vegetablize (vej'ē-ta-blīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. vegetablized, ppr. vegetablizing. [< vegetable + -ize.] To render vegetable in character or appearance.

> Silk is to be vegetablized . . . by an immersion in a bath of cellulose dissolved in ammoniacal copper oxide.
> O'Neill, Dyeing and Calico Printing, p. 36.

vegetal (vej'ē-tal), a. and n. [< OF. vegetal, F. végétal = Sp. Pg. vegetal = It. vegetale, < L. vegetus, living, lively: see vegetate.] I. a. 1. Of, pertaining, or relating to a plant or plants; having the characteristics or nature of a vegetable; vegetable.

> On the whole it appears to me to be the most convenient to adhere to the old plan of calling such of those low forms as are more animal in habit Protozoa, and such as are more vegetal Protophyta.
> Huxley, Critiques and Addresses, p. 281.

2. Of or pertaining to the series of vital phenomena common to plants and animals—namely, digestion and nutritive assimilation, growth, absorption, secretion, excretion, circulation, respiration, and generation, as contradistinguished from sensation and volition, which are peculiar to animals.

> The first are called the vegetal functions, the second the animal functions; and the powers or forces on which they depend have been termed respectively the vegetal life and the animal life.
> Brande and Cox, Dict. Sci., Lit., and Art, III. 930.

II. n. A plant; a vegetable.

> I saw vegetals too, as well as minerals, put into one glass there. B. Jonson, Mercury Vindicated.

vegetaline (vej'ē-tal-in), n. [< vegetal + -ine[2].] A material consisting of woody fiber treated with sulphuric acid, dried and converted into a fine powder, then mixed with resin soap, and treated with aluminium sulphate to remove the soda of the soap, again dried, and pressed into cakes. The substance may be made transparent by the addition of castor-oil or glycerin before pressing, and can be colored as desired. It is used as a substitute for ivory, coral, caoutchouc, etc. E. H. Knight.

vegetality (vej-ē-tal′i-ti), n. [< vegetal + -ity.] 1. Vegetable character or quality; vegetability.—2. The aggregate of physiological functions, nutritive, developmental, and reproductive, which are common to both animals and vegetables, but which constitute the sole vital processes of the latter. See vegetal, a., 2.

vegetarian (vej-ē-tā′ri-an), a. and n. [< vegetable) + -arian.] I. a. 1. Of, pertaining to, or characteristic of those who on principle abstain from animal food.—2. Consisting entirely of vegetables.

The polyprotodont type [of dentition] prevails in the American genera; the diprotodont obtains in the majority of the Australasian marsupials, and is associated usually with vegetarian or promiscuous diet.
Owen, Anat. Vert., § 220, B.

II. n. 1. One who maintains that vegetables and farinaceous substances constitute the only proper food for man.—2. One who abstains from animal food, and lives exclusively on vegetables, together with, usually, eggs, milk, etc. Strict vegetarians eat vegetable and farinaceous food only, and will not eat butter, eggs, or even milk.

vegetarianism (vej-ē-tā′ri-an-izm), n. [< vegetarian + -ism.] The theory and practice of living solely on vegetables. The doctrines and practice of vegetarianism are as old as the time of Pythagoras, and have for ages been strictly observed by many of the Hindus, as well as by Buddhists and others.

★vegetate (vej′ē-tāt), v.; pret. and pp. vegetated, ppr. vegetating. [< LL. vegetatus, pp. of vegetare (> It. vegetare = Sp. Pg. vegetar = F. végéter, grow), enliven, < vegetus, lively, < vegere, move, excite, quicken, intr. be active or lively; akin to vigere, flourish. The E. sense is imported from the related vegetable.] I. intrans. 1. To grow in the manner of plants; fulfil vegetable functions.

A weed that has to twenty summers ran Shoots up in stalk, and vegetates to man.
Farquhar, Beaux' Stratagem, Prol.

See dying vegetables life sustain,
See life dissolving vegetate again.
Pope, Essay on Man, iii. 16.

Hence—2. To live an idle, unthinking, useless life; have a mere inactive physical existence; live on without material or intellectual achievement.

The vast empire of China, though teeming with population and imbibing and concentrating the wealth of nations, has vegetated through a succession of drowsy ages.
Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 423.

II. trans. To cause to vegetate or grow. [Rare.]

Druina is tax'd abroad of a solecisme in her government, that she should suffer to run into one Grove that sap which should go to vegetate the whole Forrest.
Howell, Vocall Forrest (ed. 1645), p. 29.

★vegetation (vej-ē-tā′shon), n. [< OF. vegetation, F. végétation = Sp. vegetación = Pg. vegetação = It. vegetazione, < LL. vegetatio(n-), a quickening, < vegetare, quicken: see vegetate.] 1. The act or process of vegetating; the process of growing exhibited by plants.—2. Plants collectively: as, luxuriant vegetation.

Deep to the root
Of vegetation parch'd, the cleaving fields
And slippery lawn an arid hue disclose.
Thomson, Summer, l. 440.

3. In pathol., an excrescence or growth on any surface of the body.—Vegetation of salts, or saline vegetation, a crystalline concretion formed by salts, after solution in water, when set in the air for evaporation. These concretions appear round the surface of the liquor, affixed to the sides of the vessel, and often assume branching forms so as to resemble plants.

vegetative (vej′ē-tā-tiv), a. and n. [Early mod. E. vegetatife; < OF. vegetatif, F. végétatif = Sp. Pg. It. vegetativo, vegetative, < LL. vegetatus, pp. of vegetare, quicken: see vegetate.] I. a. 1. Descriptive of the various life processes of a plant, other than the reproductive functions, and including the phenomena of nutrition, respiration, growth, and irritability. Also vegetal.

We must look at the curious and complex laws governing the facility with which trees can be grafted on each other as incidental on unknown differences in their vegetative systems. Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 245.

2. In animal physiol., noting those functions or organs of the body which, being performed or acting unconsciously or involuntarily, are likened to the processes of vegetable growth, as digestion, circulation, secretion, and excretion, which are particularly concerned in the nutrition or in the growth, waste, and repair of the organism: opposed to the specially animal functions, as locomotion, cerebration, etc.—3. Hence, characterized by such physical processes only; lacking intellectual activity; stagnant; unprogressive.

The indolent man descends from the dignity of his nature, and makes that being which was rational merely vegetative. Steele, Spectator, No. 100.

From the inertness, or what we may term the vegetative character, of his ordinary mood, Clifford would perhaps have been content to spend one day after another, interminably, . . . in just the kind of life described in the preceding pages. Hawthorne, Seven Gables, xi.

4. Having the power to produce or support growth in plants: as, the vegetative properties of soil.—Vegetative reproduction, a form of reproduction in plants by means of cells which are not specially modified for the purpose, but which form a part of the body of the individual. Propagation by cuttings, by means of buds, soredia, gemmæ, bulbils, etc., are familiar examples. See reproduction, 3 (a).

II.† n. A vegetable.

Shall I make myself more miserable than the vegetatives and brutes? Baxter, Dying Thoughts.

vegetatively (vej′ē-tā-tiv-li), adv. In a vegetative manner.

vegetativeness (vej′ē-tā-tiv-nes), n. The character of being vegetative, in any sense.

vegete (vej′ēt), a. [= Pg. It. vegeto, < L. vegetus, vigorous, brisk: see vegetable, vegetate.] Vigorous; active. [Rare.]

He [Lucius Cornelius] had lived a healthful and vegete age till his last sickness. Jer. Taylor, Holy Dying, iv. 1.

But would my picture be complete if I forgot that ample and vegete countenance of Mr. R—— of W.?
Lowell, Study Windows, p. 380.

vegetive† (vej′ē-tiv), a. and n. [< vegete + -ive.] I. a. Vegetative.

Force vegetiue and sensatiue in Man
There is. Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 13.

II. n. A vegetable.

Make us better than those vegetives
Whose souls die with them.
Middleton, Massinger, and Rowley, Old Law, i. 1.

vegeto-alkali (vej″ē-tō-al′ka-li), n. An alkaloid.

vegeto-animal (vej″ē-tō-an′i-mal), a. and n. I. a. Partaking of the nature of both vegetable and animal matter.—Vegeto-animal matter, a name formerly applied to vegetable gluten and albumen.

II. n. An organism of equivocal character between a plant and an animal; a protist.

vegetous† (vej′ē-tus), a. [< L. vegetus, vigorous: see vegete.] Same as vegete.

If she be fair, young, and vegetous, no sweetmeats ever drew more flies. B. Jonson, Epicœne, ii. 1.

vehemence (vē′hē-mens), n. [< OF. vehemence, F. véhémence = Sp. Pg. vehemencia = It. veemenza, veemenzia, < L. vehementia, eagerness, strength, < vehemen(t-)s, eager: see vehement.] The character or state of being vehement; the energy exhibited by one who or that which is vehement. Specifically—(a) Violent ardor; fervor; impetuosity; fire: as, the vehemence of love or affection; the vehemence of anger or other passion.

Nay, I prithee now with most petitionary vehemence, tell me who it is. Shak., As you Like it, iii. 2. 200.

(b) Force or impetuosity accompanying energetic action of any kind; impetuous force; impetuosity; boisterousness; violence; fury: as, the vehemence of wind; to speak with vehemence.

A universal hubbub wild
Of stunning sounds and voices all confused, Borne through the hollow dark, assaults his ear
With loudest vehemence. Milton, P. L., ii. 954.

=Syn. Force, might, intensity, passion.

vehemency (vē′hē-men-si), n. [As vehemence (see -cy).] Same as vehemence.

The vehemency of this passion's such,
Many have died by joying overmuch.
Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 94.

vehement (vē′hē-ment), a. [< OF. vehement, F. véhément = Sp. Pg. vehemente = It. veemente, < L. vehemen(t-)s, also, often, veemen(t-)s, vēmen(t-)s, very eager, impetuous, ardent, furious, prob. vē- (expanded to vee-, vehe-), orig. neg., as in vēcors, + men(t-)s, mind: see vehicle and mental[1].] 1. Proceeding from or characterized by strength, violence, or impetuosity of feeling or emotion; very ardent; very eager or urgent; fervent; passionate.

Note, if your lady strain his entertainment
With any strong or vehement importunity.
Shak., Othello, iii. 3. 251.

I fell into some vehement argumentations with him in defence of Christ. Coryat, Crudities, I. 71.

2. Acting with great force or energy; energetic; violent; furious; very forcible.

Swell not into vehement actions which embroil and confound the earth. Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., i. 19.

Gold will endure a vehement fire for a long time.
N. Grew.

=Syn. Impetuous, fiery, burning, hot, fervid, forcible, vigorous, boisterous.

★vehemently (vē′hē-ment-li), adv. In a vehement manner; with great force or violence; urgently; forcibly; ardently; passionately.

vehicle (vē′hi-kl), n. [< OF. vehicule, F. véhicule = Sp. vehículo = Pg. vehiculo = It. veicolo, veiculo = G. vehikel (def. 2.), < L. vehiculum, a carriage, conveyance, < vehere, carry, = AS. wegan, move: see weigh[1], and cf. way, wagon, from the same ult. root.] 1. Any carriage moving on land, either on wheels or on runners; a conveyance.—2. That which is used as an instrument of conveyance, transmission, or communication.

We consider poetry . . . as a delightful vehicle for conveying the noblest sentiments.
Goldsmith, Cultivation of Taste.

Shakespeare's language is no longer the mere vehicle of thought, it has become part of it, its very flesh and blood.
Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 184.

Specifically—(a) In phar., a substance, usually fluid, possessing little or no medicinal action, used as a medium for the administration of active remedies; an excipient. (b) In painting, any liquid, whether water, as in water-color painting, or oil, as in oil-color painting, which is used to render colors, varnishes, etc., manageable and fit for use. (c) One of two enduements, the one more spiritual than the other, with which the soul is clothed, according to the Platonists. One corresponds to vital power, the other to spirit.

The vehicles of the genii and souls deceased are much-what of the very nature of the aire.
Dr. H. More, Immortal. of Soul, III. iii. 12.

Great or greater vehicle, and little or lesser vehicle (translations of Sanskrit mahāyāna and hīnayāna), names applied to two phases or styles of exposition of Buddhist doctrine—a more modern and an older, a more expanded and pretentious and a simpler—and to the treatises in which these are respectively recorded.

vehicle (vē′hi-kl), v. t.; pret. and pp. vehicled, ppr. vehicling. [< vehicle, n.] To convey in or apply or impart by means of a vehicle.

Guard us through polemic life
From poison vehicled in praise.
M. Green, The Grotto.

vehicular (vē-hik′ū-lär), a. [< LL. vehicularis, < L. vehiculum, a vehicle: see vehicle.] Of, pertaining to, or relating to a vehicle or vehicles; also, serving as a vehicle: as, vehicular traffic.

It is on such occasions that the Insides and Outsides, to use the appropriate vehicular phrases, have reason to rue the exchange of the slow and safe motion of the ancient Fly-coaches, which, compared with the chariots of Mr. Palmer, so ill deserve the name.
Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, i.

Vehicular state, the state of a ghost or disembodied spirit.

vehiculate (vē-hik′ū-lāt), v. t. and i.; pret. and pp. vehiculated, ppr. vehiculating. [< L. vehiculum, vehicle, + -ate[2].] To convey by means of a vehicle; ride or drive in a vehicle. [Rare.]

My travelling friends, vehiculating in gigs or otherwise over that piece of London road.
Carlyle, Oliver Cromwell, II. 191.

vehiculation (vē-hik-ū-lā′shon), n. [< vehiculate + -ion.] Movement of or in vehicles. [Rare.]

The New Road with its lively traffic and vehiculation seven or eight good yards below our level.
Carlyle, Reminiscences (ed. 1881), II. 168.

vehiculatory (vē-hik′ū-lā-tō-ri), a. [< vehiculate + -or-y.] Pertaining or relating to a vehicle; vehicular. [Rare.]

Logical swim-bladders, transcendental life-preservers, and other precautionary and vehiculatory gear for setting out. Carlyle, Life of Sterling, i. 8.

vehme (fā′me), n. [= F. vehme, < G. vehme, fehme, prop. feme, MHG. veme, punishment. In E. rather an abbr. of vehmgericht.] Same as vehmgericht.

vehmgericht (fām′ge-richt″), n.; pl. vehmgerichte (-richt″tā). [< G. vehmgericht, better fehmgericht, < fehme, fehm, a criminal tribunal so called (see def.), + gericht, judgment, tribunal, law; see vehme and right.] One of the mediæval tribunals which flourished in Germany, chiefly in Westphalia, in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. They were apparently descended from the cantonal courts, and at first afforded some protection, as the regular machinery of justice had been demoralized. Later they misused their power, and practically disappeared with the increasing strength of the regular governments. The president of the court was called freigraf, the justices freischöffen, and the place of meeting freistuhl. The sessions were open, at which civil matters were adjudicated, or secret, to which were summoned persons accused of murder, robbery, heresy, witchcraft, etc. Those convicted of serious crimes, or those who refused to appear before the tribunal, were put to death. Also freigerichte, Westphalian gerichte, etc.

vehmic (fā′mik), a. [< vehme + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the vehme or vehmgeircht. Also fehmic.

veil (vāl), n. [Formerly also vail, vayle; < ME. veile, veyle, vayle, fayle, < OF. veile, F. voile, a veil, also a sail, = Pr. vel = Sp. It. velo = Pg. veo, a veil, vela, a sail, = Icel. vil, < L. vēlum, a sail, cloth, covering, < vehere, carry, bear along: see vehicle. Hence veil, v., reveal, revelation, etc.] 1. A cloth or other fabric or material intended to conceal something from the eye; a curtain.

> The veil of the temple was rent in twain.
> Mat. xxvii. 51.

2. A piece of stuff, usually very light and more or less transparent, as lawn or lace, intended to conceal, wholly or in part, the features from close observation, while not materially obstructing the vision of the wearer; hence, such a piece of stuff forming a head-dress or part of a head-dress, especially for women. In the early middle ages the veil was commonly circular or semicircular in shape, and was worn in many ways. At a later time it was attached to the high and heavy head-dresses,

Veils.
1, from statue, in the Abbey of St Denis, of Isabeau of Bavaria, Queen of France, wife of Charles VI.: the statue probably dates from 1425. 2, as worn in France at the end of the 13th and beginning of the 14th century. (From Viollet-le-Duc's "Dict. du Mobilier français.") such as the escoffion and the hennin, and was a mere ornamental appendage, not admitting of being drawn over the face. The veil, when small, is indistinguishable from the kerchief. In modern use the veil is a piece of gauze, grenadine, lace, crape, or similar fabric used to cover the face, either for concealment or as a screen against sunlight, dust, insects, etc. In this capacity it usually forms no necessary part of the head-dress, but is attached to the bonnet or hat.

> Wering a vayle [var. fayle] instide of wymple.
> Rom. of the Rose, l. 3864.

> Bonnet nor veil henceforth no creature wear!
> Nor sun nor wind will ever strive to kiss you.
> Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 1081.

> Your veil, forsooth! what, do you dread being gazed at? or are you afraid of your complexion?
> Sheridan, The Duenna, i. 3.

3. Hence, anything that prevents observation; a covering, mask, or disguise; also, a pretense.

> I will . . . pluck the borrowed veil of modesty from the so seeming Mistress Page.
> Shak., M. W. of W., iii. 2. 42.

> His most objectionable enterprises, even, were covered with a veil of religion. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 24.

4. A scarf tied to or hanging from a pastoral staff. See orarium[1], 3, sudarium (a), vexillum, and banderole, 1 (b).—5. In anat. and zoöl., a velum.—6. In bot.: (a) In Hymenomycetes, same as velum, 2 (a). (b) In Discomycetes, a membrane stretching over the mouth of the cup: rare in this sense. (c) In mosses, same as calyptra, 1 (a).—7. In phonation, an obscuration of the clearness of the tones, either from a natural conformation of the larynx or from some accidental condition, as fatigue or a cold. The natural veil in some gifted and highly trained singers is often a beauty, while a huskiness due to imperfect use or accidental interference is a decided blemish. A voice in which a veil is present is called veiled, or voce velata or voix sombr'e.—Demi-veil, a short veil worn by women, which superseded about 1555 the long veil previously worn.—Egyptian veil, in modern costume for women, a veil worn around the head and neck and tied under the chin.—Eucharistic veils, sacramental veils, the veils or cloths of linen, silk, etc., used to cover the eucharistic vessels and the elements or species during the celebration of mass or holy communion. Those ordinarily used in the Western Church are the pall, the chalice-veil, which covers both chalice and paten before, after, and during part of celebration, and, in the Anglican Church, the post-communion veil. To these may be added the corporal (partly used to cover the bread), the humeral veil, and formerly the offertory veil. In the Greek Church there are separate veils for the paten and chalice, and a third veil, of thinner material, the air or aër, covering both.—Humeral, Lenten, offertory veil. See the qualifying words.—Marginal veil. See velum, 2 (a).—To take the veil, to assume the veil according to the custom of a woman when she becomes a nun; hence, to retire to a nunnery. On first entering the nunnery the applicant takes the white veil; if after her novitiate she desires to become a nun, in certain convents she takes the black veil, when she pronounces the irrevocable vows.—Veil of the palate. See palate.

> Take thou no mete (be welle wer off itte)
> Vnto grace be seyd, and ther-to veylle thi hode.
> Booke of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), i. 58.

> Her face was veil'd, yet to my fancied sight
> Love, sweetness, goodness, in her person shined.
> Milton, Sonnets, xviii.

2. To invest; enshroud; envelop; hide.

> I veil bright Julia underneath that name.
> B. Jonson, Poetaster, i. 1.

> No fog-cloud veiled the deep. Whittier, The Exiles.

> She bow'd as if to veil a noble tear.
> Tennyson, Princess, iii.

3. Figuratively, to conceal; mask; disguise.

> To keep your great pretences veil'd till when > They needs must show themselves.
> Shak., Cor., i. 2. 20.

> Half to show, half veil the deep intent.
> Pope, Dunciad, iv. 4.

Veiled calamary, a cephalopod of the genus Histioteuthis, with six arms webbed together, the other arms loose, and the coloration gorgeous.—Veiled plate, in photog., a negative or other plate of which the parts that should be clear are obscured by a slight fog.—Veiled voice. See veil, n., 7.

veiler (vā′lėr), n. [Formerly also vailer; < veil + -er[1].] One who or that which veils.

> Swell'd windes
> And fearefull thunder, vailer of earth's pride.
> Tourneur, Trans. Metamorphosis, st. 3.

veiling (vā′ling), n. [Formerly also vailing; verbal n. of veil, v.] 1. The act of concealing with a veil.—2. A veil; a thin covering.—3. Material for making veils: as, nun's-veiling; silk veiling.

veilless (vāl′-les), a. [< veil + -less.] Destitute of a veil. Tennyson, Geraint.

veilleuse (vā-lyėz′), n. [F., a night-light, a float-light, < veille, watch, vigil: see vigil.] In decorative art, a shaded night-lamp. The shade or screen in such lamps was frequently the medium for rich decoration.

Veilleuse of gilded bronze, 16th century.

★vein (vān), n. [< ME. veine, veyne, vayne, < OF. (and F.) veine = Sp. It. vena = Pg. veia, < L. vēna, a blood-vessel, vein, artery, also a watercourse, a vein of metal, a vein or streak of wood or stone, a row of trees, strength, a person's natural bent, etc.; prob. orig. a pipe or channel for conveying a fluid, < vehere, carry, convey: see vehicle, and cf. veil, from the same source.] 1. In anat., one of a set of blood-vessels conveying blood from the periphery to the physiological center of the circulation; one of a set of membranous canals or tubes distributed in nearly all the tissues and organs of the body, for the purpose of carrying blood from these parts to the heart. The walls of the veins are thinner, as a rule, and more flaccid, than those of the arteries; they are composed of three layers or coats—the outer or fibrous; the middle, made up chiefly of sparse muscular fibers; and the inner or serous. The inner or lining membrane, especially in the veins of the lower extremities, presents numerous crescentic folds, usually in man occurring in pairs, known as the valves of the veins, which serve to prevent a backward flow of the blood. The nutrition of the walls is provided for by the vasa vasorum. The nerves supplying the walls of the veins are few in number. There are two systems of veins—the systemic, or those carrying venous blood from the tissues of the body to the right auricle of the heart; and the pulmonary, or those carrying the oxygenated blood from the lungs to the left auricle of the heart. The portal system is a subdivision of the systemic, in which blood coming from the digestive organs is conducted to the liver by the portal vein, circulates throughout this organ, is again collected in the hepatic veins, and is thence carried to the right auricle of the heart. The veins of the portal system have no valves. The blood in the systemic veins is dark-red in color, and flows in a continuous stream. The umbilical veins of the fetus, like the pulmonary veins, convey oxygenated or arterial blood. As a general rule, the corresponding veins and arteries run side by side, and are called by the same names. In fishes and other low vertebrates which breathe by gills, the veins from these organs correspond in function, but not morphologically, with pulmonary veins. There is a reniportal system of veins in some animals, as Amphibia and reptiles, by which the kidneys receive blood from veins as well as by renal arteries. See phrases below, and vena. See also cuts under circulation, heart, liver, lung, median[1], and thorax.

Veins.
a, vein laid open, showing the valves arranged in pairs; b, section, showing action of the valves; c, external view of vein, showing the moniliform appearance caused by the valves when distended.

> The gret vayne of his gorge gird vne ysondur,
> That the freike, with the frusshe, fell of his horse.
> Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 5829.

2. Loosely, any blood-vessel. Many of the veins being superficial or subcutaneous, liable to ordinary observation, and when swollen or congested very conspicuous, the name is popularized, and extended to the arteries, while artery remains chiefly a technical term.

> A dram of poison, such soon-speeding gear
> As will disperse itself through all the veins.
> Shak., R. and J., v. 1. 61.

3. In entom., one of the ribs or horny tubes which form the framework of the wings of an insect, and between which the thin membrane of the wings is spread and supported; a nervure. Veins result from certain thickenings of the upper and under surfaces of the sac which primarily composes the wing, these thickenings being exactly coapted, and often hollowed or channeled for the reception of air-tubes—which enables the wings to subserve to some extent the functions of lungs. The primary veins give out veinlets or nervules. The venation of the wings differs much in different insects, but is sufficiently constant in each case to afford valuable classificatory characters. See cuts under Chrysopa, Cirrophanus, nervure, and venation.

4. In bot., a fibrovascular bundle at or near the surface of a leaf, sepal, petal, etc.: same as nerve, 7. See nervation.—5. In mining, an occurrence of ore, usually disseminated through a gangue or veinstone, and having a more or less regular development in length, width, and depth. A fissure-vein, or true vein, is a vein in which the ore and veinstone occupy a preëxisting fissure or crack in the rocks, which has been formed by some deep-seated cause or crust-movement, and may therefore be presumed to extend downward indefinitely, and for the same reason is likely to have considerable development in length. True veins usually have well-defined walls, on which there is more or less flucan or gouge, and which are often striated or polished, giving rise to what miners call slickensides. True veins often have the ore and veinstone arranged in parallel plates or layers, called combs. Experience shows that true veins are more to be depended on for permanence in depth than other more irregular deposits, although the latter are often highly productive for a time. A vein and a lode are, in common usage, essentially the same thing, the former being rather the scientific, the latter the miner's, name for it. The term deposit, when used by itself, means an irregular occurrence of ore, such as a flat-mass, stock, contact deposit, carbona, and the like; but when to deposits the term ore or metalliferous is prefixed (ore-deposits, metalliferous deposits), the designation becomes the most general one possible, including every form of occurrence of the metalliferous ores, and having the same meaning as the French gîtes métallifères and the German Erzlagerstätten. A bed of rock forming a member of a stratified formation, with which it was synchronously deposited, cannot properly be called a vein or lode, even if it has metalliferous matter generally disseminated through it in quantity sufficient to be worth working, as is the case with the cupriferous slate (Kupferschiefer) of Mansfeld in Prussia, or when it is concentrated in pipes or pipe-like masses, occurring here and there in the stratum, as in the silver-lead mines of Eureka in Nevada. (See ore-deposit.) Further—(a) for forms of ore-deposits which are not true veins, but which are designated by the name vein, see gash-vein, segregated vein (also segregation), pipe-vein; (b) for forms qualified, according to general usage, by the name deposit (which also see), and which are still further removed from the class of true veins than those previously noted, see contact deposit (under contact), blanket-deposit; (c) for other still more irregular forms of ore-deposit, which have special names, and which, while not themselves properly designated as veins, are frequently more or less closely connected with true veins, occurring in close proximity, and forming a kind of appendage, to them, see flat[1], 10, pipe[1], 16, carbona, impregnation, 4; and (d) for German mining terms applied to various irregular forms of ore-deposit, not true veins, which terms are often used by scientific writers in English in describing mining regions or in discussing the general mode of occurrence of the metalliferous ores, see stock[1], 32, stockwork, fahlband. See also lode[1], 3, leader, 5 (a); also rake-vein, a term applied in Derbyshire, England, to true veins to distinguish them from the flats and pipe-veins with which they are closely connected.

6. A cavity, fissure, or cleft, as in the earth or other substance.

To do me business in the veins o' the earth.
Shak., Tempest, i. 2. 255.

7. A streak, stripe, or marking, of different color or shade, as in natural marble or wood cut so as to show the grain, or glass in which different colors have been melted irregularly. The term is applied either to a long and nearly regular stripe, or to a much broken and contorted one, returning upon itself. Also called veining.

8. A streak; a part of anything marked off from the rest by some distinctive character; hence, a distinct property or characteristic considered as running through or being intermingled with others; a continued strain.

I saw in divers places very fat and fruitfull veines of ground, as goodly meadows. Coryat, Crudities, I. 50.

He can open a vein of true and noble thinking. Swift.

There was likewise, at times, a vein of something like poetry in him; it was the moss or wall-flower of his mind in its small dilapidation. Hawthorne, Seven Gables, iv.

9. Manner of speech or action; particular style, character, disposition, or cast of mind.

I knowe not if my iudgement shall haue so delicate a veine, and my pen so good a grace, in giuing counsel as in reprehending.
Guevara, Letters (tr. by Hellowes, 1577), p. 132.

This is Ercles' vein, a tyrant's vein.
Shak., M. N. D., i. 2. 42.

I have heard before of your lordship's merry vein in jesting against our sex. Beau. and Fl., Woman-Hater, ii. 1.

10. Particular mood, temper, humor, or disposition for the time being.

I am not in the giving vein to-day.
Shak., Rich. III., iv. 2. 119.

I continued, for I was in the talking vein.
O. W. Holmes, Autocrat, i.

Accessory portal veins. See portal[1].—Alar artery and vein. See alar.—Alveolar vein. See alveolar.—Anal veins, veins about the anus and lower end of the rectum; the hemorrhoidal veins, whose congestion or varication constitutes piles.—Anastomotic vein, a cerebral vein, derived from the outer surface of the parietal lobe, which passes along the posterior fork of the Sylvian fissure, and then backward to join the superior petrosal sinus. Also called great anastomotic vein.—Angular vein. See angular.—Anterior auricular veins. See auricular.—Anterior cardiac veins, two or three small veins which run upward on the front of the right ventricle, and empty into the auricle immediately above the auriculoventricular groove.—Anterior facial vein. Same as facial vein.—Anterior internal maxillary vein. Same as deep facial vein.—Anterior ulnar vein, a small superficial vein of the anterior ulnar aspect of the forearm, uniting with the posterior ulnar vein to form the common ulnar vein. See cut under median[1].—Anterior vertebral vein, a vein receiving blood from the plexus over the cervical artery, and discharging into the lower end of the vertebral vein.—Ascending lumbar vein. See lumbar veins, below.—Auricular veins, veins collecting blood from the external ear and its vicinity. See anterior and posterior auricular veins, under auricular.—Axillary, azygous, basilar vein. See the adjectives.—Basilic veins. See basilic, and cut under median[1].—Basispinal veins, the venæ basis vertebrarum (which see, under vena). See also venæ spinales (under vena).—Bedded vein. See blanket-deposit.—Brachial, bronchial, buccal vein. See the adjectives.—Capsular vein, the suprarenal vein.—Cardinal veins, the venous trunks which in the embryo run forward, one on each side, beneath the axial skeleton, to meet the primitive jugular veins, and turn with them into the heart through the ductus Cuvieri. They are permanent in fishes, but in man and higher vertebrates form the azygous veins.—Central artery and vein of retina. See central.—Cephalic vein. See cephalic, and cut under median[1].—Cerebral veins, the veins of the cerebrum, divided into the superficial, those ramifying upon its surface, and the deep, those within the ventricles.—Choroid vein. See choroid.—Ciliary veins, tributaries of the ophthalmic vein, corresponding in general with the arteries of the same name.—Colic veins, venæ comites of the colic arteries, discharging into the mesenteric veins.—Common iliac vein, a vein formed on each side by the confluence of the external and internal iliac veins, and uniting to form the inferior vena cava near the junction of the fourth and fifth lumbar vertebræ.—Common temporal vein. Same as temporal vein.—Common ulnar vein, a short inconstant trunk formed by the union of the anterior and posterior ulnar veins, and uniting with the median basilic to form the basilic vein.—Companion veins, venæ comites of arteries; veins, usually a pair, which run in the course of arteries and lie close to the latter: when paired along the course of any artery, they are usually connected with each other at short intervals by cross veins.—Contracted vein, in hydraul. See contracted.—Coronary vein. See coronary, and great cardiac vein, below.—Coronary vein of the stomach, a vein of considerable size accompanying the coronary artery, and discharging into the portal vein.—Costal, cross, crural vein. See the adjectives.—Deep cervical vein, a vein of large size beginning in the suboccipital region and descending the neck, between the complexus and semispinalis muscles, to the lower part, where it turns forward to join the vertebral vein.—Deep circumflex iliac vein, the vena comes of the artery of the same name.—Deep facial vein, a vein of considerable size coming from the pterygoid plexus to open into the facial vein below the malar bone.—Deep median vein, a short, wide tributary of the median near its bifurcation, communicating with the deep veins.—Dental veins, companion veins, superior and inferior, of the arteries of the same name, discharging into the pterygoid plexus.—Diploic veins. See diploic.—Dorsal vein of the penis, a large vein, formed by the union of branches from the glans, lying in the median dorsal groove of the penis, and receiving tributaries from the corpus spongiosum, corpora cavernosa, and skin, and terminating in the prostatic plexus.—Dorsispinal veins. See dorsispinal, and venæ spinales (under vena).—Dural veins, numerous small veins anastomosing freely between the inner and outer layers of the dura mater of the brain, communicating also with the diploic veins.—Emissary vein. See emissary.—Emulgent vein. Same as renal vein.—Epigastric vein. See epigastric.—Esophageal veins, several veins carrying blood from the esophagus to the azygous veins.—Ethmoidal veins, tributaries of the ophthalmic vein, corresponding to the ethmoidal arteries.—External iliac vein, the continuation of the femoral vein above Poupart's ligament, accompanying the external iliac artery, and uniting with the internal iliac to form the common iliac vein.—Externomedian vein. See externomedian.—Facial, femoral, free vein. See the adjectives.—Falciform vein, the inferior longitudinal sinus of the falx cerebri. See sinus.—Frontal vein, a vein receiving the blood from the forehead, uniting with the supra-orbital at the inner end of the eyebrow to form the angular vein.—Gastro-epiploic vein, the companion vein of the gastro-epiploic artery, discharging into the splenic vein.—Gluteal vein. See gluteal.—Great anastomotic vein. See anastomotic vein, above.—Great cardiac vein, the coronary vein. It begins at the apex of the heart, passes up along the anterior ventricular groove to the base, winds around to the left, and terminates in the coronary sinus.—Great jugular vein. Same as internal jugular vein. See jugular.—Hepatic veins. See hepatic.—Hypogastric vein, the internal iliac vein. See iliac[1].—Iliac vein. See iliac[1].—Iliolumbar vein, a vein, corresponding to the iliolumbar artery, opening into the common iliac vein.—Inferior longitudinal vein, the inferior longitudinal sinus. See longitudinal sinus, under sinus.—Inferior palatine vein, a tributary of the facial, receiving blood from the plexus surrounding the tonsil and from the soft palate.—Inferior palpebral veins. See palpebral vein.—Inferior phrenic veins, companion veins of the arteries of the same name, opening on the right into the vena cava, on the left often into the suprarenal vein.—Inferior thyroid veins, veins of large size formed by branches from the thyroid body, descending on the front of the trachea, where they form a plexus, and emptying into the innominate veins.—Infra-orbital vein, the companion vein of the infra-orbital artery, discharging into the pterygoid plexus.—Innominate vein. Same as innominata[1] (b).—Insulate, intercostal, interlobular, internal vein. See the adjectives.—Internal mammary veins, a pair of companion veins of each artery of the same name, discharging by a single trunk on each side into the innominate vein.—Internal maxillary vein, a short vessel, often double, which passes back from the pterygoid plexus to join the temporal. It receives tributaries which are mostly companion veins of the branches of the artery of the same name.—Internomedian vein. See internomedian.—Jugular veins. See jugular.—Jugulocephalic vein. See jugulocephalic.—Lacrymal vein, a tributary of the ophthalmic vein, corresponding to the lacrymal artery.—Left cardiac vein. Same as great cardiac vein.—Lingual, longitudinal, marginal vein. See the adjectives.—Lumbar veins, veins corresponding to the several lumbar arteries, discharging into the inferior vena cava. They are connected with one another, on each side of the body, in front of the transverse processes, by branches which thus form a continuous longitudinal vessel called the ascending lumbar vein.—Median basilic vein. See basilic, and cut under median[1].—Median cephalic vein. See median[1] (with cut).—Median vein. See median[1] (with cut).—Medullispinal veins, the proper veins of the spinal cord. See venæ spinales (under vena).—Meningorachidian veins, spinal veins in the interior of the spinal column, between the vertebræ and the sheath of the spinal cord. See venæ spinales (under vena).—Mental veins, veins of the chin, tributaries of the facial.—Mesenteric vein. See mesenteric.—Middle cardiac vein, the vein which, beginning at the apex of the heart, passes up along the posterior interventricular groove to empty into the coronary sinus.—Middle cerebral vein, one of the inferior superficial cerebral veins, of large size, from the under surface of the frontal and temporosphenoidal lobes, discharging into the cavernous sinus.—Middle sacral veins, two companion veins of the middle sacral artery, discharging by a single trunk into the left common iliac vein.—Middle temporal vein. See temporal[2].—Nasal veins, small branches from the sides and bridge of the nose, tributary to the angular vein.—Oblique vein of the heart. See oblique.—Obturator, occipital, ophthalmic, orbital, ovarian, palatine, palpebral, pancreatic vein. See the qualifying words.—Parietal emissary vein. See parietal.—Parotid, parumbilical, pericardial, peroneal, petrosal, pharyngeal, phrenic, plantar, popliteal, portal, postcostal vein. See the adjectives.—Posterior auricular vein. See auricular.—Posterior cardiac veins, three or four veins that ascend on the posterior surface of the left ventricle, to open into the coronary sinus.—Posterior ulnar vein, a superficial vein of the forearm, arising from the dorsal plexus of the hand, and passing up the posterior ulnar aspect of the forearm to unite with the anterior ulnar or median basilic. See cut under median[1].—Posterior vertebral vein. Same as deep cervical vein.—Pubic, pudic, pulmonary, pyloric vein. See the adjectives.—Radial vein. (a) A superficial vein of the forearm, arising from the plexus on the back of the hand, and ascending along the outer part of the forearm to form the cephalic vein by union with the median cephalic. See cut under median[1]. (b) In entom. See marginal vein.—Radiant vein. See radiant.—Ranine vein, one of the lingual veins conspicuously seen beneath the tongue, on either side of the frenum, emptying into the internal jugular or facial vein.—Renal veins. See renal.—Right coronary vein, a small vein that collects blood from the posterior parts of the right auricular and ventricular walls, and passes in the right auriculoventricular groove to empty into the coronary sinus.—Sacral, saphenous, scapular veins. See the adjectives.—Satellite vein. See satellite-vein.—Sciatic vein, the vena comes of the sciatic artery.—Segregated vein, an ore-deposit having some of the characteristics of a true vein, but differing from it in not exhibiting evidences of the existence of a fissure prior to the deposition of the ore. Segregated veins usually run parallel with the lamination of the rocks in which they are inclosed, and do not have well-defined walls and selvages.—Sinuses of veins. See sinus.—Small coronary vein. Same as right coronary vein.—Smallest cardiac veins, minute veinlets of variable number coming from the substance of the heart, and emptying into the right and left auricles. Also called venæ cordis minimæ.—Spermatic plexus of veins. See spermatic.—Sphenopalatine, spinal, splenic, spurious, stellate, stylomastoid, subclavian, subcostal, submarginal, submaxillary, submental vein. See the adjectives.—Superior intercostal vein, a short vessel which receives the veins from two or three intercostal spaces below the first, that of the right side joining the large azygous, that of the left emptying into the left innominate vein.—Superior labial vein, a vein forming a close plexus in the substance of the upper lip, and emptying into the facial opposite the nostril.—Superior palatine vein. See palatine vein.—Superior palpebral veins. See palpebral vein.—Supra-orbital, suprarenal, suprascapular vein. See the adjectives.—Sylvian vein, a vein running along the bottom of the Sylvian fissure.—Systemic veins, the veins of the general circulation, as distinguished from those of the portal or pulmonic system.—Temporal, temporomaxillary, Thebesian veins. See the adjectives.—Thyroid vein. (a) Middle, a vein from the lateral lobe of the thyroid body, emptying into the internal jugular. (b) Superior, a vein from the upper part of the thyroid body, emptying into the internal jugular, or frequently into the facial vein.—To bar a vein. See bar[1].—Transverse cervical vein, the companion vein of the transverse cervical artery, tributary to the posterior external jugular vein. Also called transversalis colli vein.—Transverse facial vein, one of two veins from the surface of the masseter muscle, tributary to the temporal.—Transverse vein, the left innominate vein, which in man traverses the root of the neck nearly horizontally, and is thus quite different in its course from the vein of the same name on the right side, than which it is also much longer.—True vein. See def. 5.—Umbilical, vaginal, varicose veins. See the adjectives.—Vein of the corpus striatum, the vein which passes forward in the groove between the corpus striatum and the optic thalami to unite with the choroid vein.—Vein of Trolars. Same as anastomotic vein.—Veins of Breschet, the diploic veins.—Veins of Galen. See venæ Galeni, under vena.—Vertebral vein, a vein formed by the union of branches from the back part of the scalp and the deep muscles of the nape, behind the foramen magnum, and descending with the vertebral artery in the vertebrarterial canal to empty into the innominate vein.—Vesical veins. See vesical.

vein (vān), v. t. [< vein, n.] To fill or furnish with veins; cover with veins; streak or variegate with or as with veins.

Through delicate embrodered Meadows, often veined with gentle gliding Brooks. Drayton, Polyolbion, Pref.

Not tho' all the gold
That veins the world were pack'd to make your crown.
Tennyson, Princess, iv.

veinage (vā'nāj), n. [< vein + -age.] Veining; veins collectively; markings in the form of veins. R. D. Blackmore, Alice Lorraine, xlviii.

veinal† (vā'nal), a. [< vein + -al. Cf. venal[2].] Same as venous. Boyle. (Imp. Dict.) vein-blood† (vān'blud), n. [< ME. veyne-blood; < vein + blood.] Bleeding of the veins.

Nother veyne-blood, ne ventusinge,
Ne drinke of herbes may ben his helpinge.
Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 1889.

veined (vānd), a. [< vein + -ed[2].] 1. Full of veins; veiny.—2. Characterized by or exhibiting venation, as insects' wings; in bot., having veins, as a leaf; traversed by fibrovascular strands or bundles.—3. Marked as if with veins; streaked; variegated, as marble.—4. Running in the blood; ingrained. [Rare.]

In thy prayers reckon up
The sum in gross of all thy veined follies.
Ford, Love's Sacrifice, v. 1.

veining (vā'ning), n. [Verbal n. of vein, v.] 1. The formation or disposition of veins; venation; a venous network.—2. Streaking. (a) A streak or stripe of color, as in a piece of marble. Compare vein, n., 7. (b) The variegated surface produced by a number of such streaks or stripes.

3. In weaving, a stripe in the cloth formed by a vacancy in the warp.—4. A kind of needlework in which the veins of a piece of muslin are wrought to a pattern.

veinless (vān'les), a. [< vein + -less.] Having no veins; not venous; not veined, in any sense.

veinlet (vān'let), n. [< vein + -let.] 1. A small vein; a venous radicle uniting with another to form a vein; a venule.—2. In entom., one of the secondary or lesser veins of the wings: same as nervule. See vein, n., 3.—3. In bot., a small vein; one of the ultimate or smaller ramifications of a vein or rib; a nerville.—Internomedian veinlet. See internomedian.

vein-like (vān'lik), a. Resembling a vein.

veinous (vā'nus), a. [< vein + -ous. Cf. venous.] 1. Same as venous or veiny. [Rare.]

He . . . covered his forehead with his large brown veinous hands. Dickens, Great Expectations, xxxix.

2. In bot. and zoöl., veined; provided with veins or nerves.

veinstone (vān'stōn), n. 1. The earthy or non-metalliferous part of a lode, vein, or ore-deposit. See gangue.—2. A concretion formed within a vein; a phlebolite. Also venous calculus.

vein-stuff (vān'stuf), n. Same as lodestuff.

veinule (vā'nūl), n. [< F. veinule, < L. venula, dim. of vena, vein: see vein.] A minute vein.

veiny (vā'ni), a. [< vein + -y[1].] Full of veins; veined, in any sense.

Hence the veiny Marble shines;
Hence Labour draws his tools.
Thomson, Summer, l. 135.

Vejovis (vē-jō'vis), n. [NL. (Koch, 1836), also Væjovis, < L. Vejovis, Væjovis, Vediovis, an Etruscan divinity regarded as opposed to Jupiter, < ve-, not, + Jovis, Jupiter, Jove: see Jove.] A notable genus of scorpions, having ten eyes and a pentagonal sternum. It is regarded by some authors as the type of a family Vejovidæ.

vekket, n. Same as veck.

vela, n. Plural of velum.

velamen (vē-lā'men), n.; pl. velamina (-mi-nä). [NL., < L. velamen, a covering, veil, < velare, cover, veil: see veil, v.] Same as velamentum.—Velamen nativum, the integument or skin.—Velamen vulvæ, the pudendal apron; an enormous hypertrophy of the labia minora, which sometimes hang down in long flaps on the thighs. It is commonly called Hottentot apron, from the fact that it is often seen in women of this race.

velamentous (vel-a-men'tus), a. [< velamentum + -ous.] 1. In the form of a thin membranous sheet; veil-like.—2. Resembling or serving as a sail: as, the velamentous arms of the nautilus.

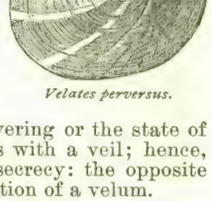
velamentum (vel-a-men'tum), n.; pl. velamenta (-tä). [NL., < L. velamentum, a cover, covering, < velare, cover, veil: see veil, v.] In anat. and zoöl., a membrane or membranous envelop; a covering, as a veil or velum.—Velamenta bombycina, villous membranes.—Velamenta cerebralia or cerebri, the meninges of the brain.—Velamenta infantis, the enveloping membranes of the fetus.—Velamentum abdominale, the peritoneum.—Velamentum linguæ, the glosso-epiglottic folds or ligament: three folds of mucous membrane passing from the root of the tongue to the epiglottis.

velar (vē'lär), a. [< L. velaris, < velum, veil: see veil.] Of or pertaining to a veil or velum; forming or formed into a velum; specifically, in philol., noting certain sounds, as those represented by the letters gw, kw, qu, produced by the aid of the veil of the palate, or soft palate.



They [the Semitic alphabets] have no symbols for certain classes of sounds, such as the velar gutturals, which are found in other languages.
Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, I. 160.

velarium (vē-lā'ri-um), n.; pl. velaria (-ä). [L., < velum, veil: see veil.] 1. An awning which was often drawn over the roofless Roman theaters and amphitheaters to protect the spectators from rain or the sun. Also velum.—2. [NL.] In zoöl., the marginal membrane of certain hydrozoans; the velum. See velum, 4.

velary (vē'lär-i), a. [< L. velum, a sail, + -ary[2].] Pertaining to a ship's sail.

velate (vē'lāt), a. [< L. velatus, pp. of velare, cover, veil: see veil, v.] Veiled; specifically, in zoöl. and bot., having a velum.

Velates (vē-lā'tēz), n. [NL. (Montfort, 1810), irreg. < L. velatus, pp. of velare, cover, veil: see veil.] A genus of fossil gastropods, of the family Neritidæ, which lived during the Eocene age, as V. perversus.

Velates perversus.

velation (vē-lā'shon), n. [< LL. velatio(n-), a veiling, < L. velare, pp. velatus, veil: see veil, v.] 1. A veiling; the act of covering or the state of being covered with or as with a veil; hence, concealment; mystery; secrecy: the opposite of revelation.—2. Formation of a velum.

velatura (vel-a-tö'rä), n. [It., < velare, cover, veil: see veil, v.] In the fine arts, the art or process of glazing a picture by rubbing on a thin covering of color with the hand. It was a device much practised by early Italian painters.

veldt (velt), n. [Also veld; < D. veld, field, ground, land: see field.] In South Africa, an unforested or thinly forested tract of land or region; grass country. The higher tracts of this character, entirely destitute of timber, are sometimes called the high veldt; areas thinly covered with undergrowth, scrub, or bush are known as bush-veldt.

The pastoral lands or velds, which extend chiefly around the outer slopes and in the east, are distinguished, according to the nature of the grass or sedge which they produce, as "sweet" or "sour." Encyc. Brit., V. 42.

velet, n. An old spelling of veil.

Velella (vē-lel'ä), n. [NL. (Lamarck; Oken, 1815), dim. of L. velum, veil: see veil.] 1. The typical genus of Velellidæ. The best-known member of the genus is V. vulgaris, the sallee-man, an inch or two in length, semi-transparent, of a beautiful blue color, floating on the surface of the sea, with a vertical crest like a sail (whence the name). Another is V. mutica.

A Velella (Velella mutica).

2. [l. c.] A member of this genus.

Velellidæ (vē-lel'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Velella + -idæ.] A family of discoidal oceanic hydrozoans, represented by the genera Velella and Porpita, belonging to the order Physophora and suborder Discoideæ. The stem is converted into a disk with a system of canalicular cavities, above which rests a pneumatocyst or float of dense tough texture. From the disk hang the hydriform persons (see person, 8), usually a gastrozooïd surrounded by smaller persons which give rise to generative medusiforms, and by marginal dactylozooïds. The medusiforms mature before their liberation from the stock; when free, these formed the pseudogenus Chrysomitra. The Velellidæ are nearly related to the well-known Portuguese man-of-war.

Velia (vē'li-ä), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1807), perhaps < Velia, a Greek colony in southern Italy.] A genus of semi-aquatic water-bugs, typical of the family Veliidæ. It is represented by a few species only, in South America, Mexico, and Europe. V. rivulorum of Europe is the largest and best-known species. It is found in England, Germany, France, Spain, and Italy, upon clear rivers and creeks, from early spring until cold weather in autumn.

velic (vē'lik), a. [< L. velum, a sail, + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a ship's sail.—Velic point. Same as center of effort (which see, under center[1]).

veliferous (vē-lif'e-rus), a. [< L. velifer, sail-bearing, < velum, a veil, sail (see veil), + ferre = E. bear[1].] 1. Bearing or carrying sails: as, "veliferous chariots," Evelyn, Navigation and Commerce, § 25. [Rare.]—2. In zoöl., having a velum; velate; veligerous; velamentous.

veliform (vel'i-fôrm), a. [< L. velum, veil, + forma, form.] Forming a velum; resembling or serving as a veil or velum; velamentous.

veliger (vel'i-jėr), n. [< LL. veliger, sail-bearing: see veligerous.] One who or that which bears a velum; in Mollusca, specifically, the veligerous stage of the embryo, or the embryo in that stage, when it has a ciliated swimming-membrane or velum (see velum, 3, and typembryo). The veliger develops directly from the mere trochosphere with its circlet of cilia, and continues through the period of persistence of the ciliated formation, which assumes various shapes in the different groups of mollusks.

veligerous (vē-lij'e-rus), a. [< LL. veliger, sail-bearing, < L. velum, sail, veil, + gerere, bear.] In zoöl., bearing a velum; veliferous: specifically noting an embryonic stage of mollusks. See velum, 3, and cut under veliger. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 416.

Veligerous Embryos of Chiton: a, developing from the trochosphere, with a simple circlet of cilia, into b, c, successive veliger stages.

Veliidæ (vē-lī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Amyot and Serville, 1843, in form Velides), < Velia + -idæ.] A family of heteropterous insects, of the section Aurocorisa, closely related to the Hydrobatidæ or water-striders. The body is usually stout, oval, and broadest across the prothorax. The rostrum is three-jointed, and the legs are not very long. They live mainly upon the surface of the water, always near the banks, but also move with great freedom on land. About 12 species, of 6 genera, occur in the United States.

velitation†, (vel-i-tā'shon), n. [< L. velitatio(n-), a bickering, a dispute, < velitari, skirmish, < veles (velit-), a light-armed soldier; cf. velex, swift, unimpeded: see velocity.] A dispute or contest; a slight skirmish. Blount, 1670.

velite (vē'līt), n. [< L. velites, pl. of veles, a kind of light-armed soldier.] A light-armed Roman soldier. Soldiers of this class were first formed into a corps at the siege of Capua, 211 B. C., and disappeared about a century later.

velivolant (vē-liv'ō-lant), a. [< L. velivolan(t-)s, flying with sails, < velum, sail, + volare, fly: see volant.] Passing under sail. Bailey, 1731. [Rare.]

vell[1] (vel), n. [A dial. form of fell, skin: see fell[3], etc.] 1. A skin; membrane.—2. The rennet of the calf. [Prov. Eng.]

vell[2] (vel), v. t. [< vell[1], n.] To cut off the turf or sward of land. [Prov. Eng.]

Vella (vel'ä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1753), < L. vela, given as the Gallic name of the plant called erysimum or irio: see Erysimum.] A genus of plants, of the family Brassicaceæ and tribe Sinapeæ. It is characterized by a short, turgid, gibbous silique with a broad tongue-like beak, and only one or two seeds in each cell. The 3 species are natives of Spain and Algeria; they are much-branched and diminutive shrubs with erect, rigid, woody, and sometimes spiny stems. They bear entire leaves and rather large yellow flowers somewhat spicately disposed, the lower flowers bracteate. Known as Spanish cress and cress-rocket.

vellarin (vel'a-rin), n. An oleaginous substance extracted from Centella Asiatica.

velleity (ve-lē'i-ti), n. [= F. velléité = Sp. veleidad = Pg. velleidade = It. velleità, < ML. velleita(t-)s, irreg. < L. velle, will, wish: see will[1].] Volition in the weakest form; an indolent or inactive wish or inclination toward a thing, which leads to no energetic effort to obtain it: chiefly a scholastic term.

Though even in nature there may be many good inclinations to many instances of the Divine commandments, yet it can go no further than this velleity, this desiring to do good, but is not able.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 12.

Velleity—the term used to signify the lowest degree of desire, and that which is next to none at all, when there is so little uneasiness in the absence of any thing that it carries a man no farther than some faint wishes for it.
Locke, Human Understanding, II. xx. 6.

vellenage†, n. A obsolete irregular form of villeinage. Spenser, F. Q., II. xi. 1.

vellet†, n. An obsolete form of velvet.

velli, n. Plural of vellus.

vellicate (vel'i-kāt), v. [< L. vellicatus, pp. of vellicare, pluck, twitch, < vellere, pluck, tear out.] I. trans. To twitch; cause to twitch convulsively, as the muscles and nerves of animals.

Convulsions arising from something vellicating a nerve.
Arbuthnot.

II. intrans. 1. To move spasmodically; twitch, as a nerve.—2†. To carp or detract. Blount.

vellication (vel-i-kā'shon), n. [< L. vellicatio(n-), a plucking, twitching, < vellicare, pluck, twitch: see vellicate.] 1. The act of twitching or of causing to twitch.—2. A twitching or convulsive motion of a muscular fiber. Compare subsultus.

There must be a particular sort of motion and vellication imprest upon my nerves, . . . else the sensation of heat will not be produced. Watts, Improvement of Mind, xix.

vellicative (vel'i-kā-tiv), a. [< vellicate + -ive.] Having the power of vellicating, plucking, or twitching.

vellon (ve-lyōn'), n. [< Sp. vellón = Pg. billião, bilhão, a copper coin of Castile: see billon, billion[2].] A Spanish money of account. The term is also used like the English word sterling. The reale de vellon is worth about 4½ cents.

velloped (vel'opt), a. [Appar. a corruption of jelloped, ult. of dewlapped.] In her., having pendent gills or wattles like those of a cock: a term used only when the gills are borne of a different tincture from the rest of the bearing.

Vellozia (ve-lō'zi-ä), n. [NL. (Vandelli, 1788), named after a Brazilian scientist Vellozo, who collected the plants.] A genus of monocotyledonous plants, of the family Velloziaceæ, distinguished from Barbacenia, the other genus of the family, by a perianth-tube not prolonged above the ovary. There are about 40 species, natives of Brazil. They are erect perennials, with a fibrous and usually dichotomous stem densely clothed with the projecting or imbricating bases of fallen leaves, and commonly arborescent. The rigid linear leaves are crowded at the ends of the branches; they are short and strict, or elongated and often pungent-pointed. The flowers are commonly handsome, white, sulphur-yellow, violet, or blue, and are solitary or two or three together within a cluster of leaves; the perianth is bell-shaped or funnel-form, with equal ovate-oblong or long-stalked distinct segments. The fruit is a globose-oblong or three-angled capsule, sometimes roughened or echinate. The plant is known as tree-lily, the flowers resembling lilies. The heavy branching trunk, from 2 to 10 feet high, is often as thick as a man's body; its leaves, tufted at the top, suggest those of the yucca. They impart the characteristic aspect to some of the mountainous districts of Brazil.

Velloziaceæ (ve-lō-zi-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Drude, 1886), < Vellozia + -aceæ.] A family of monocotyledonous plants. It is characterized by a woody and usually branching stem, and by one-flowered peduncles, solitary or few together within a fascicle of leaves, usually with a persistent perianth, and with six to eighteen stamens. It includes about seventy species, classed in the 2 genera Vellozia and Barbacenia, the former confined to Brazil, the latter occurring there and also in Africa, Madagascar, and the Mascarene Islands.

vellum (vel'um), n. [Formerly also vellam, velame, early mod. E. velym; < ME. velim, velym, velyme, < OF. velin, F. vélin, < ML. vitulinum*, also vitulinium, also pellis vitulina (cf. It. vitellina), calfskin, vellum, neut. (or fem.) of vitulinus, of a calf, < L. vitulus, a calf: see veal. Vellum thus represents the adj. of veal, 'calf.' For the terminal form vellum, < vitulinum, cf. venom, < venenum.] The skin of calves prepared for writing, printing, or painting by long exposure in a bath of lime and by repeated rubbings with a burnisher; also, the skin of goats or kids similarly prepared.

By common consent the name of parchment has in modern times given place to that of vellum, a term properly applicable only to calf-skin, but now generally used to describe a mediæval skin-book of any kind.
Encyc. Dict., XVIII. 144.

Abortive or uterine vellum, a vellum made from the very thin skins of still-born or unborn animals.—Vellum paper. See paper.—Vellum point. See point[1].—Vellum post, a post paper having a smooth finished surface in imitation of the surface of vellum.—Vellum wove paper, a wove writing-paper with a smooth surface in imitation of the surface of vellum.

vellum-form (vel'um-fôrm), n. In paper-manuf., a form of fine brass wirework used to give a delicate even surface to vellum paper.

vellus (vel'us), n. [NL., < L. vellus, a fleece; cf. velvet, villous.] In bot., the stipe of certain fungi.

vellutet†, n. Same as velvet.

veloce (ve-lō'che), adv. [It., quick; < L. velox, swift: see velocity.] In music, with great rapidity; presto. The word is generally appended to a particular passage that is to be performed in bravura style, without regard to the fixed tempo of the piece.

velociman (vē-los'i-man), n. [< L. velox (veloc-), swift, + manus, hand: see main[3]. Cf. velocipede.] A vehicle of the nature of a velocipede, driven by hand.

velocimeter (vel-ō-sim'e-tėr), n. [= F. vélocimètre, < L. velox (veloc-), swift, + Gr. μέτρον, measure.] 1. An apparatus for measuring velocity or speed. The name is applied to a large number of instruments, ranging from a ship's log to an electro-ballistic apparatus, and including the speed-gage and speed-recorder for machinery.

2. Specifically, an instrument for measuring the initial velocity of a projectile.

velocipede (vē-los'i-pēd), n. [= F. vélocipède; < L. velox (veloc-), swift, + pes (ped-), foot.] A light vehicle or carriage, with two wheels or three, impelled by the rider. One of the older forms of this carriage consisted of two wheels of nearly equal size, placed one before the other, and connected by a beam on which the driver's seat was fixed. The rider, sitting astride the machine, propelled it by the alternate thrust of each foot on the ground. This form dates from the early part of the nineteenth century. Later, treadles operating cranks on the axle of the front wheel came into use, and many modified and improved kinds have become popular under the name of bicycle. (See also tricycle.) Light boats driven by a paddle-wheel or wheels operated by cranks and treadles, and known as water-velocipedes, have also been brought into use. See also cuts under bicycle and tricycle.

velocipedean, n. A velocipedist.

velocipedist (vē-los'i-pē-dist), n. [< velocipede + -ist.] One who uses a velocipede.

velocity (vē-los'i-ti), n.; pl. velocities (-tiz). [< OF. velocite, F. vélocité = Sp. velocidad = Pg. velocidade = It. velocità, < L. velocita(t-)s, swiftness, speed, < velox (veloc-), swift.] 1. Quickness of motion; speed in movement; swiftness; rapidity; celerity: used only (or chiefly) of inanimate objects. See def. 2.—2. In physics, rate of motion in which direction as well as speed is considered; the rate at which a body changes its position in space; the change of position of a point per unit of time. The velocity of a body is uniform when it passes through equal spaces in equal times, and it is variable when the spaces passed through in equal times are unequal. The velocity of a body is accelerated when it passes constantly through a greater space in equal successive portions of time, as is the case with falling bodies under the action of gravity, and it is retarded when a less space is passed through in each successive portion of time. When the motion of a body is uniform its velocity is measured by the space described by it in a unit of time, as one second. If the motion of the body is not uniform its velocity is measured by the space which it would describe uniformly in a given time if the motion became and continued uniform from that instant of time.

The cool and heavy water of the polar basin, coming out in under currents, would flow equatorially with equal (almost mill-tail) velocity.
M. F. Maury, Phys. Geography of the Sea, § 437.

3. In music, decided rapidity of tempo or pace, particularly in a bravura passage.—Absolute, aggregate, angular velocity. See the adjectives.—Angular velocity of rotation. See rotation.—Composition of velocities. See composition of displacements, under composition.—Initial velocity, the rate of movement of a body at starting: especially used of the velocity of a projectile as it issues from a firearm, more properly muzzle-velocity.—Remaining velocity, the velocity of a projectile at any point of its flight after leaving the muzzle of the piece.—Resolution of velocities. See resolution.—Terminal velocity. See terminal.—Velocity diagram, function, potential. See diagram, etc.—Virtual velocity. See virtual.=Syn. 1. Celerity, Swiftness, etc. See quickness.

velonia (vē-lō'ni-ä), n. Same as valonia.

velouett, velouettet, n. Obsolete forms of velvet. Chaucer.

velours (ve-lör'), n. [Also velour; < OF. velours, velvet: see velure.] Same as velure: the more common form in trade use.—Jute velours, a sort of velvet made of jute, used in upholstery.

veloutine (vel-ö-tēn'), n. [F., < velouté, velvet, + -ine[3].] A French corded fabric of merino and fancy wool.

veltfare, veltiver, n. Dialectal forms of fieldfare.

A veltfare or a snipe. Swift.

velum (vē'lum), n.; pl. vela (-lä). [NL., < L. velum, a veil, sail: see veil.] 1. Same as velarium, 1.

I have crossed the town and entered the primitive theatre, installed in the court-yard of a house covered with a velum, the galleries of the first floor constituting the boxes. Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 758.

2. In bot.: (a) In Hymenomycetes, a special membranous envelop which incloses for a time the whole or a part of the sporophore. When it extends as a horizontal membrane from the margin of the pileus to the stipe, it is called a velum partiale or marginal veil. It is ruptured by the expanding pileus, when it forms the annulus or ring on the stipe. When the velum is a sac which incloses the whole of the sporophore, it is called a velum universale, or volva. It is ultimately ruptured at the apex by the expansion of the cap. (b) In Isoëtes, the outgrown membranous margin of the fovea. Also called involucrum.—3. In Mollusca, the highly characteristic ciliated formation of the embryo, which serves as an organ of locomotion in that stage when the embryo is called a veliger. It is usually soon lost, but in some cases is permanently retained in a modified form. See cuts under veliger.—4. In Hydrozoa, a kind of flap or circular free edge which projects inward around the margin of the disk of many hydrozoans, as those which are bell-shaped or conical, and which from its presence are called craspedote; a velarium. The velum is present in all well-developed hydromedusans, but seldom in scyphomedusans, in which latter it is known as the pseudovelum. See cuts under Diphyidæ and medusiform.

5. In Infusoria, a delicate veil-like membrane bordering the mouth in such forms as Cyclidium and Pleuronema.—6. In sponges, one of the transverse diaphragms or partitions which constrict the lumen of an incurrent or excurrent canal.—7. In Rotifera, the trochal disk. See cuts under trochal, Rotifer, and Rotifera.—8. In entom., a membrane attached to the inner side of the cubital spur in certain bees. Kirby and Spence.—9. In anat., a veil, or a part likened to a veil.—Inferior or posterior medullary velum (velum medullare posterius), a thin white lamella of a semilunar form, continuous by its superior border with the central white substance of the vermis inferior of the cerebellum, and having its concave border free or continuous with the epithelial covering of the hind part of the roof of the fourth ventricle. Sometimes called metatela.—Superior or anterior medullary velum (velum medullare anterius). Same as valve of Vieussens. See valve.—Velum interpositum, the prolongation of the pia mater over the third ventricle and optic thalami, its highly vascular margins, projecting into the lateral ventricles, forming the choroid plexuses of those cavities. Also called tela choroidea superior and velum triangulare.—Velum pendulum, velum palati, velum palatinum, the veil or curtain of the palate; the soft or pendulous palate, especially its posterior part, in many animals prolonged into a pendent teat-like process, the uvula. (See cut under tonsil.) In cetaceans the velum forms a muscular canal which prolongs the posterior nares to the larynx, which it embraces, an arrangement bearing relation to the spouting of a whale.—Velum terminale, the terminal lamina of the brain; the anterior boundary of the general ventricular cavity of the brain, or front wall of the third ventricle, from the pituitary to the pineal body. In the embryo, before the cerebral and olfactory lobes extend forward, it is the front of the anterior cerebral vesicle, and therefore the anterior termination of the cerebrospinal axis. Also called terma, and lamina terminalis.—Velum triangulare. Same as velum interpositum.

velumen (vē-lū'men), n. [NL., < L. velumen, a fleece; cf. vellus, a fleece.] 1. In bot., the velvety coating formed over some leaves by short soft hairs.—2. In zoöl., velvet; a velvety or velutinous surface or covering.

velure (vel'ūr), n. [< OF. velours (with unorig. r), velous, velou, velouz, F. velours, velvet, < ML. villosus, velvet, lit. 'shaggy' (sc. pannus, cloth), < L. villosus, shaggy: see villous. Cf. velvet, from the same ult. source.] 1. A textile fabric having a thick soft nap; velvet or velveteen.

An old hat
Lin'd with velure.
Fletcher (and another), Noble Gentleman, v.

The bragging velure-canioned hobby-horses prance up and down, as if some o' the tilters had ridden 'em.
Dekker and Webster, Northward Ho, ii. 1.

2. A pad of silk or plush used by hatters for smoothing and giving a luster to the surface of hats. Also called looer, lure.

velure (vel'ūr), v. t. [< velure, n.] In hat-making, to smooth off or dress with a velure, as the nap of a silk hat.

The hat is velured in a revolving machine by the application of haircloth and velvet velures. Encyc. Brit., XI. 520.

Velutina (vel-ū-tī'nä), n. [NL. (De Blainville, 1825, or earlier), < ML. velutum, velvet.] The typical genus of Velutinidæ.

velutine (vē-lū'tin), a. [< ML. velutum, velvet, + -ine[1].] Same as velutinous.

Velutinidæ (vel-ū-tin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (J. E. Gray, 1840), < Velutina + -idæ.] A family of tænioglossate gastropods, typified by the genus Velutina, inhabiting northern seas, having a fragile, ear-shaped, and mostly external shell, the median radular tooth squarish and multicuspid, and the marginal teeth narrow.

velutinous (vē-lū'ti-nus), a. [< velutine + -ous.] Resembling velvet; velvety; soft. Specifically—(a) In bot., having a hairy surface which in texture resembles that of velvet, as in Kalosanthes coccinea. (b) In entom., covered with very close-set short upright hairs, like the pile of velvet.

velveret (vel'vėr-et), n. [Irreg. dim. of velvet.] An inferior sort of velvet, the web of which is of cotton and the pile of silk. It is stiff, and keeps its color badly.

velvet (vel'vet), n. and a. [Also vellet (also vellute, < It.); < ME. velvet, velwet, felvet, velouet, velouette, < OF. velvet (Roquefort), velvet (cf. vellueau, velvet, velu, shaggy, velouté, velveted, velvety, veluette, mouse-ear), = Sp. Pg. velludo, shag, velvet, = OIt. veluto, It. velluto, velvet, < ML. villutus*, found only in forms reflecting the Rom., namely, vellutus, velutum, velluetum, velluellum, etc., velvet, lit. (like villosus, velvet, > OF. velous, F. velours, > E. velure) 'shaggy' cloth, < L. villus, shaggy hair, wool, nap of cloth, a tuft of hair, akin to vellus, a fleece; cf. Gr. ἔριον, wool, E. wool: see wool.] I. n. 1. A closely woven silk stuff having a very thick and short pile on one side, which is formed by carrying part of the warp-thread over a needle, and cutting the loops afterward. Inferior kinds are made with a cotton back (see velveret), and are commonly called cot on-backed velvets. Cotton velvets are also made. (See cotton[1], and also velveteen.) These imitations and inferior qualities are so common that real velvet is commonly called silk velvet or Lyons velvet to distinguish it from them.

By hir beddes heed she made a mewe,
And covered it with velouettes blewe.
Chaucer, Squire's Tale, l. 636.

Her shirt was o' the grass-green silk,
Her mantle o' the velvet fyne.
Thomas the Rhymer (Child's Ballads, I. 109).

Velvet (from It. velluto, "shaggy") had a silk weft woven so as to form a raised pile, the ends of which were cut or shaved off to one even level: hence it is also called in Italy raso. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 210.

2. The covering of a growing antler, consisting of the modified periosteum peculiar to antlers, with cuticle and fur. It bears the same relation to the nutrition of the antler that periosteum does to that of bone. Its sloughing or exuviation follows the constriction and final obliteration of its vessels—a process which is accomplished or favored by the growth of the bur about the base of the antler, which cuts off or obstructs the circulation of blood. The antler subsequently receives no nourishment, and is itself shortly afterward exuviated or cast as a foreign body.

Good antlers "in the velvet" will sell readily for four dollars a pound in any part of Siberia.
The Century, XXXVII. 646.

3. Money gained through gambling: as, to play on velvet (that is, to gamble with money previously won). [Slang.]—Embossed-velvet work, a kind of needlework done by outlining the raised pattern of embossed velvet with gold thread or similar brilliant material.—Genoese or Genoa velvet. See Genoese.—Raised velvet, velvet in which there is a pattern in relief. Also called embossed velvet.—Stamped velvet. See stamp.—Tapestry velvet or patent velvet carpet. See tapestry.—Tartan velvet. See tartan[1].—Terry velvet. See terry.—To stand on velvet, to have made one's bets so that one cannot lose. [Racing slang.]—Uncut velvet, velvet in which the loops are not cut: same as terry.—Utrecht velvet, a plush used in velvet upholstery, made of mohair, or, in inferior qualities, of mohair and cotton.—Velvet upon velvet, velvet of which a part of the pile is higher or deeper than the rest, the raised part forming a pattern. Compare pile upon pile, under pile[4].

II. a. 1. Made of velvet.

This morning was brought home my new velvet cloak—that is, lined with velvet, a good cloth the outside—the first that I ever had in my life. Pepys, Diary, Oct. 29, 1663.

2. Soft and smooth to the touch; resembling velvet in this respect.

The cowslip's velvet head. Milton, Comus, l. 898.

3. Very soft and smooth to the taste: as, old velvet Bourbon.—Velvet ant, a solitary ant, of the family Mutillidæ; a spider-ant: so called from the soft hairy covering. velvet-work (vel'vet-wėrk), n. Embroidery upon velvet.

velvety (vel'vet-i), a. [< velvet + -y[1].] 1. Resembling velvet; having a nap like that of velvet; also, soft and smooth to the eye or to the touch, somewhat like velvet: as, velvety texture among minerals.

Textures are principally of three kinds:—(1) Lustrous, as of water and glass. (2) Bloomy, or velvety, as of a rose-leaf or peach. (3) Linear, produced by filaments or threads, as in feathers, fur, hair, and woven or reticulated tissues.
Ruskin, Lectures on Art, § 135.

2. Having a peculiar soft or smooth taste.

The rum is velvety, sugary, with a pleasant, soothing effect. Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 216.

3. Having a contact like that of velvet; touching softly: as, a velvety touch on the piano.

vena (vē'nä), n.; pl. venæ (-nē). [NL., < L. vena, a blood-vessel, a vein: see vein.] In anat., a vein. See vein.—Fossa of the vena cava. See fossa[1].—Vena azygos, an azygous vein. See azygous.—Vena cava, either of the two main trunks of the systemic venous system, discharging into the right cardiac auricle. (a) The inferior or ascending vena cava returns the blood from the lower limbs and abdomen, beginning at the junction of the two common iliac veins in front of the fourth lumbar vertebra, and thence ascending on the right side of the aorta to and through the tendon of the diaphragm to empty into the lower part of the right cardiac auricle. It receives the lumbar, spermatic, renal, capsular, hepatic, and inferior phrenic veins. (b) The superior or descending vena cava returns the blood from the head and neck, the upper limbs, and the whole of the thorax. It is formed by the junction of the right and left innominate veins, behind the junction of the first costal cartilage of the right side with the sternum, and descends nearly vertically to empty into the right auricle of the heart. It receives the pericardial and mediastinal veins and the large azygous vein. In vertebrates at large the two venæ cavæ are distinguished as postcaval and precaval veins. See cuts under circulation, diaphragm, embryo, heart, lung, pancreas, and thorax.—Vena comes (pl. venæ comites), a companion vein; a satellite-vein; a vein, often one of a pair, which closely accompanies an artery in its course. The larger arteries have usually one, the smaller arteries two.—Vena contracta, in hydraul. See contracted vein, under contracted.—Venæ basis vertebrarum, the basispinal veins; the veins of the body of each of the vertebræ. See venæ spinales, below.—Venæ comites, See vena comes, above.—Venæ cordis minimæ, the smallest cardiac veins (which see, under vein).—Venæ externæ, in Tuberaceæ, peculiar white veins observed on a section of the sporophore, produced by the dense tissue containing air, which fills the asciferous chambers. De Bary.—Venæ Galeni, the veins of Galen; the veins of the cerebral ventricles, and especially one of the main trunks by which these veins empty into a venous sinus.—Venæ internæ, in Tuberaceæ, dark-colored veins seen on a section of the sporophore, indicating the walls of the asciferous chambers, which are composed of tissue containing no air. De Bary.—Venæ lymphaticæ. Same as venæ internæ.—Venæ spinales, the spinal veins; the many veins and venous plexuses in and on the spinal column, draining blood from the vertebral bones and spinal cord and its membranes. In man these veins are arranged and named in four sets—the basispinal, dorsispinal, medullispinal, and meningorachidian. All these veins are valveless, and form extensive and intricate anastomoses with one another.—Venæ vorticosæ, ciliary veins: same as vasa vorticosa. See vas.—Vena lienalis, the splenic vein.—Vena porta, vena portæ, the portal vein. See portal[1], and cuts under circulation, liver, embryo, and pancreas.—Vena salvatella, the vein of the little finger, emptying into the superficial ulnar.

venada (ve-nä'dä), n. [Sp. venado, a deer, < L. venatus, hunting, the chase, game: see venatic, and cf. venison.] A small deer of Chili, Pudua humilis, the pudu.

venal[1] (vē'nal), a. [< OF. venal, F. vénal = Sp. Pg. venal = It. venale, < L. venalis, of or pertaining to selling, purchasable, < venus, also venum, sale, = Gr. ὠνος, price; cf. ὠνή, purchase, = Skt. vasna, price, wages, wealth; perhaps < √ vas, dwell, exist: see was. From L. venus are ult. E. vend[1], etc.] 1. Ready to sell one's services or influence for money or other valuable consideration, and entirely from sordid motives; bought or to be bought basely or meanly for personal gain; mercenary; hireling: used of persons: as, a venal politician.

Venal and licentious scribblers, with just sufficient talents to clothe the thoughts of a pandar in the style of a bellman, were now the favourite writers of the Sovereign and the public. Macaulay, Milton.

2. Characterized by or springing from venality; also, made a matter of sordid bargaining and selling: used of things.

Beasts are brought into the temple, and the temple itself is exposed to sale, and the holy rites, as well as the beasts of sacrifice, are made venal.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 103.

All my professions . . . might be ascribed to venal insincerity. Goldsmith, To Mrs. Lawder.

=Syn. Venal, Mercenary, Hireling. These words represent a person or thing as ready to be dishonorably employed for pay. Each is strongest in one sense. Venal is strongest in expressing the idea of complete sale to a purchaser—character, honor, principle, and even individuality being surrendered for value received, the venal man doing whatever his purchaser directs, a venal press advocating whatever it is told to advocate. Mercenary is strongest in expressing rapacity, or greed for gain, and activity. Hireling is strongest in expressing servility and consequent contempt, hire having become an ignoble word for pay: as, a hireling soldiery; a hireling defamer. A venal man sells his political or other support; a mercenary man sells his work, being chiefly anxious to get as much pay as possible; a hireling will do mean or base work as long as he is sure of his pay. Venal means a being ready to sell one's principles, whether he makes out to sell them or not; mercenary and hireling suggest more of actual employment.

venal[2] (vē'nal), a. [= Sp. Pg. venal, < NL. venalis, < L. vena, vein: see vein. Cf. veinal.] Of or pertaining to the veins; venous: as, venal blood or circulation. [Obsolescent.]

venality (vē-nal'i-ti), n. [< OF. venalite, F. vénalité = Sp. venalidad = Pg. venalidade = It. venalità, < LL. venalita(t-)s, capability of being bought, < L. venalis, purchasable: see venal[1].] The state or character of being venal, or sordidly influenced by money or financial considerations; prostitution of talents, offices, or services for money or reward; mercenariness.

He preserved his independence in an age of venality.
Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, xliii.

Infamous Venality, grown bold,
Writes on his bosom to be let or sold.
Cowper, Table-Talk, l. 416.

venall†, n. See vennel.

venally (vē'nal-i), adv. In a venal manner; mercenarily.

Venantes† (vē-nan'tēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of venan(t-)s, ppr. of venari, hunt, chase: see venation[1].] The hunting-spiders, a group of spiders so called because, instead of weaving webs in which to lie in wait, they run or leap about to chase and catch their prey. See Mygalidæ, Lycosidæ, and cuts under bird-spider, Mygale, tarantula, and wolf-spider.

venary[1]†, n. An obsolete form of venery.

venary[2]† (ven'a-ri), a. [Irreg. < L. venari, hunt, chase: see venation[1]. Cf. venery[1].] Of or pertaining to hunting. Howell.

venasquite (ve-nas'kīt), n. [< Venasque (see def.) + -ite[2].] In mineral., a variety of ottrelite, found at Venasque in the Spanish Pyrenees.

venatic (vē-nat'ik), a. [< L. venaticus, of or pertaining to hunting, < venatus, hunting, the chase, < venari, hunt, chase: see venation[1].] 1. Of or pertaining to hunting; used in hunting.

Newton's guess that the diamond was inflammable, and many instances which must occur to the reader, are of the true artsman kind; he did it by a sort of venatic sense.
Dr. J. Brown, Spare Hours, 3d ser., p. 202.

2. Given to hunting; fond of the chase.

venatica† (vē-nat'i-kä), n. Same as vinatico.

venatical (vē-nat'i-kal), a. [< venatic + -al.] Same as venatic.

There be three for Venary or Venatical Pleasure in England: viz., A Forest, a Chase, and a Park.
Howell, Letters, iv. 16.

venatically (vē-nat'i-kal-i), adv. In a venatic manner; in the chase.

venation[1]† (vē-nā′shọn), n. [< L. venatio(n-), hunting, a hunt, < venari, hunt. Cf. venison, a doublet of venation[1]; cf. also venery[1].] 1. The art or practice of hunting; pursuit of game. Sir T. Browne.—2. The state of being hunted. Imp. Dict.

venation[2] (vē-nā′shọn), n. [< NL. venatio(n-), < L. vena, a vein: see venal[2], vein.] 1. In bot., the manner in which veins or nerves are distributed in the blade of a leaf or other expanded organ. See nervation.—2. In entom.: (a) The mode or system of distribution of the veins of the wings. (b) These veins or nervures, collectively considered as to their arrangement. See vein, 3, and cut under nervure.

venational (vē-nā′shọn-ạl), a. [< venation[2] + -al.] In entom., of or pertaining to venation: as, venational characters of insects' wings; venational differences or description.

venatorial (ven-ạ-tō′ri-ạl), a. [< L. venator, a hunter (< venari, hunt: see venation[1]), + -i-al.] Relating to the chase; pertaining to hunting; venatic. [Rare.]

Oh! that some sylvan deity, patron of the chase, would now inspire Brown with venatorial craft.
Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 94.

vencuset, v. A Middle English form of vanquish.

vend[1] (vend), v. t. [< F. vendre = Sp. Pg. vender = It. vendere, < L. vendere (pret. vendidi, pp. venditus), sell, cry up for sale, praise, contr. of venundare, venumdare, also, as orig., two words, venum dare, sell, < venum, sale, price, + dare, give: see venal[1] and date[1].] To transfer to another person for a pecuniary equivalent; sell: as, to vend goods.

Amongst other comodities, they vended much tobaco for linen cloath, stuffs, &c., which was a good benefite to ye people. Bradford, Plymouth Plantation, p. 234.

The Greeks . . . tell you that Zebedee, being a Fisherman, was wont to bring Fish from Joppa hither, and to vend it at this place.
Maundrell, Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 98.

The other nut-sellers in the streets vend the almond-nuts. . . . The materials are the same as those of the gingerbread. . . . A split almond is placed in the centre of each of these nuts.
Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 213.

vend[1]† (vend), n. [< vend[1], v.] Sale; market.

She . . . has a great vend for them (and for other curiosities which she imports).
Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe, IV. 165. (Davies.)

Vend[2] (vend), n. Same as Wend[2].

vendable† (ven′dạ-bl), a. [ME., < OF. vendable (= Pg. vendavel), < vendre, sell: see vend[1]. Cf. vendible.] Same as vendible.

For love is over al vendable. Rom. of the Rose, l. 5804.

vendace (ven′dās), n. [Also vendis; < OF. vendese, vendoise, vandoise, F. vandoise, F. dial. vaudoise, ventoise, dace; origin unknown.] A variety of the whitefish, Argyrosomus willughbyi or A. vandesius. It is noted for its restricted distribution, being found in Great Britain only in Lochmaben, in Dumfriesshire, and in two or three of the English lakes, and on the Continent in some of the rivers and lakes of Sweden. The body is deep and compressed, the back brown, the sides tinged with yellow, the belly silvery, the tail broadly forked, and the pectoral and ventral fins yellow. The average length is from 6 to 7 inches. The fish is esteemed a great delicacy, and is taken with the sweep-net about August.

vendage†, n. A Middle English form of vintage.

Vendean (ven-dē′ạn), a. and n. [< F. Vendéen; as Vendée (see def.) + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Vendée, a department of western France, or the Vendeans.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Vendée; specifically, a partizan of the royalist insurrection against the republic and the Revolution which was begun in western France in 1793, and whose chief seat was in Vendée.

vendee (ven-dē′), n. [< vend[1] + -ee[1].] The person to whom a thing is sold: opposed to vendor.

If a vicar sows his glebe, or if he sells his corn, and the vendee cuts it, he must pay the tithes to the parson.
Ayliffe, Parergon.

Vendémiaire (von-dā-mi-ãr′), n. [F., < L. vindemia, grape-gathering, vintage, wine: see vindemial.] The first month of the French revolutionary calendar, beginning (in 1793) September 22d, and ending October 21st.

vender (ven′dėr), n. [Also vendor; < OF. vendour*, vendeur, F. vendeur = Sp. Pg. vendedor = It. venditore, < L. venditor, seller, < vendere, sell: see vend[1]. Cf. venditor.] One who vends or sells; a seller: as, a news-vender.

vendetta (ven-det′ạ), n. [< It. vendetta, a feud, < L. vindicta, vengeance, revenge, < vindicare, claim, arrogate, defend one's self: see vindicate, venge.] A condition of private war in which the nearest of kin execute vengeance on the slayer of a relative; a blood-feud. In Corsica the vendetta is regarded as a duty incumbent on the family of the murdered man, and, failing to reach the real murderer, they take vengeance on his relatives. The practice exists, although to a more limited extent, in Sicily, Sardinia, Calabria, Afghanistan, etc., and in certain rude and remote districts of the United States.

The various forms of private vengeance which have become common in this country are in many respects allied to Italian vendetta as it existed and may to some extent still exist in Corsica and Calabria, and with modifications in Naples, where, as has been said, "it is reduced to rule and recognized by public opinion."
N. A. Rev., CXXXIX. 73.

vendibility (ven-di-bil′i-ti), n. [< vendible + -it-y; cf. L. vendibiliter, salably.] The state of being vendible or salable.

The vendibility of commodities.
Jer. Taylor, Rule of Conscience, iv. 1.

vendible (ven′di-bl), a. and n. [< OF. vendible = Sp. vendible = Pg. vendivel = It. vendibile, < L. vendibilis, that may be sold, salable, < vendere, sell: see vend[1].] I. a. Capable of being or fit to be vended or sold; to be disposed of for money; salable; marketable.

Foxe skins, white, blacke, and russet, will be vendible here. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 309.

Silence is only commendable
In a neat's tongue dried and a maid not vendible.
Shak., M. of V., i. 1. 112.

II. n. Something to be sold or offered for sale: as, butter, fowls, cheese, and other vendibles.

vendibleness (ven′di-bl-nes), n. Vendibility.

vendibly (ven′di-bli), adv. In a vendible or salable manner.

vendicate†, v. See vindicate.

vendis (ven′dis), n. See vendace.

venditate† (ven′di-tāt), v. t. [< L. venditatus, pp. of venditare, offer again and again for sale, freq. of vendere, sell: see vend[1].] To set out, as for sale; hence, to display ostentatiously; make a show of.

This they doe in the subtiltie of their wit, . . . as if they would venditat them for the very wonders of natures worke. Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxxvii. 12.

venditation† (ven-di-tā′shọn), n. [< L. venditatio(n-), an offering for sale, a boasting, < venditare, try to sell, freq. of vendere, sell, cry up for sale, boast: see vend[1].] An ostentatious display.

Some [plagiarists], by a cunning protestation against all reading, and false venditation of their own naturals, think to divert the sagacity of their readers from themselves.
B. Jonson, Discoveries.

The venditation of our owne worth or parts or merits argues a miserable indigence in them all.
Bp. Hall, Occasional Meditations, § 30.

vendition (ven-dish′ọn), n. [< L. venditio(n-), a sale, < vendere, pp. venditus, sell: see vend[1].] The act of selling; sale. [Rare.]

By way of vendition, or sale, he gives them up.
Langley, Sermons (1644), p. 20. (Latham.) vendor (ven′dọr), n. Same as vender, but more common in legal use. In the law of conveyancing the word is commonly used in reference to the preliminary or executory contract of sale, usually made in writing before the execution of a deed to transfer the title, and designates him who agrees to sell, and who after he has actually conveyed is commonly called the grantor. So if A contracts, not as agent but on his own account, to sell and convey property belonging to B, and procures B to convey accordingly, A is the vendor and B the grantor.

Our earliest printers were the vendors and the binders of their own books. I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., II. 425.

In sales of lands the party selling is almost always spoken of as "the vendor"; but in sales of goods he is quite as frequently spoken of as "the seller."
Mozley and Whiteley.

Vendor and Purchaser Act, a British statute of 1874 (37 and 38 Vict., c. 78) which enacts that forty years (instead of sixty) be the period of commencement of title to land sold, unless otherwise stipulated, and further affects the relations of vendor and purchaser of lands.—Vendor's liens. See lien[2].

vendue (ven-dū′), n. [< OF. vendue, a sale, < vendu, pp. of vendre, sell: see vend[1].] A public auction.

I went ashore, and, having purchased a laced waistcoat, with some other cloaths, at a vendue, made a swaggering figure. Smollett, Roderick Random, xxxvi. (Davies.)

We'd better take maysures for shettin' up shop,
An' put off our stock by a vendoo or swop.
Lowell, Biglow Papers, 2d ser., v.

vendue-master† (ven-dū′màs″tėr), n. An auctioneer. Wharton.

venet, n. A Middle English form of vein.

veneer (vē-nėr′), v. t. [Formerly also fineer; corrupted (prob. in factory use) from furneer*. < G. furniren, fourniren = D. fornieren, furniren (cf. Dan. finere, < E. ?), inlay, veneer, furnish, < OF. fornir, F. fournir = Pr. fornir, formir, fromir = Sp. Pg. fornir = It. fornire, furnish: see furnish[1].] 1. To overlay or face, as an inferior wood, with wood of a finer or more beautiful kind, so as to give the whole the appearance of being made of the more valuable material; cover with veneers: as, to veneer a wardrobe or other article of furniture.

The Italians call it [marquetry] pietre commesse, a sort of inlaying with stones, analogous to the fineering of cabinets in wood. Smollett, Travels, xxviii.

The bottom and sides of the frame seem to be fineered, and inlaid, probably with ivory, tortoise-shell, and mother-of-pearl. Bruce, Source of the Nile, I. 130.

2. To cover with a thin coating of substance similar to the body, in other materials than wood, as in ceramics.

It [Oiron (or Henri Deux) ware] is strictly a veneered pottery. . . . The object was formed in clay, and then covered with a thin skin of the same material.
Art Jour., VIII. 155.

Hence—3. To impart a more agreeable appearance to, as to something vicious, worthless, or forbidding; disguise with a superficial attraction; gild.

A rogue in grain,
Veneer'd with sanctimonious theory.
Tennyson, Princess, Prol.

Thoughtfulness for others, generosity, modesty, and self-respect are the qualities which make a real gentleman or lady, as distinguished from the veneered article which commonly goes by that name.
Huxley, Critiques and Addresses, p. 8.

veneer (vē-nėr′), n. [< veneer, v.] 1. A thin piece of wood of a choice kind laid upon another of a more common sort, so as to give a superior and more valuable appearance to the article so treated, as a piece of furniture. Choice and beautiful kinds of hard woods, as mahogany or rosewood, are used for veneers, the wood to which they are attached by gluing being usually deal or pine. Ivory, mother-of-pearl, and other ornamental substances are sometimes used as veneers for small articles, as cabinets or caskets.

2. A thin coating covering the body of anything, especially for decorative purposes: used when the material of the outer coating is similar to that of the body, as in ceramics or in paper-manufacturing. [Rare.]—3. Show; superficial ornament; meretricious disguise.

It is still often possible to hush up scandals, to play fast and loose with inconvenient facts, to smooth over fundamental differences with a veneer of external uniformity.
H. N. Oxenham, Short Studies, p. 143.

The knowing world's people from Lenox said, when they returned from their visit, that they doubted whether the Shaker neatness were more than a summer veneer, and were quite sure that in winter the houses were no tidier than other houses. Harper's Mag., LXXX. 479.

4. In entom., a veneer-moth.—Veneer-bending machine, a machine used in putting on veneers, to apply a uniform pressure to every part of a curved or uneven surface. It operates by hydraulic pressure transmitted through caoutchouc or other flexible material. E. H. Knight.—Veneer-planing machine, a shaving-tool for smoothing veneered and similar surfaces. E. H. Knight.—Veneer-polishing machine, a machine for rubbing and polishing veneered or other wooden surfaces.—Veneer-straightening machine, a machine for flattening out veneers which have been cut in the form of a scroll from a circular log bolt. Such machines employ a flexible pressure with adjustable tension, and are designed with a view to avoid splitting the material.

veneer-cutter (vē-nėr′kut″ėr), n. A machine for cutting veneers from the log or block of wood; a veneer-cutting machine. Two systems are used in these machines: in one the log of wood is rotated before a long, thin knife fixed in the machine, the revolution shaving off a thin veneer of the entire length of the log, the log being gradually advanced to the knife until completely cut up; in the other system the knife-blade moves as a slicer over the block of wood or ivory. Still another method is to use a fixed knife, and to draw a square block of wood over the edge of the knife. Both circular and reciprocating saws are also used to make wood veneers. See veneer-saw.

veneering (vē-nėr′ing), n. [Verbal n. of veneer, v.] 1. The art or process of laying on veneers.—2. Same as veneer, in senses 1–3.

veneering-hammer (vē-nėr′ing-ham″ėr), n. A hand-tool with a thin and wide peen or face, used to press out the glue from under a veneer in securing it to an object.

veneer-mill (vē-nėr′mil), n. A sawmill designed especially for cutting veneers.

veneer-moth (vē-nėr′môth), n. Any one of several pyralid moths of the family Crambidæ:

an old English collectors' name, given from the coloration, which suggests veneering. Crambus hortuellus is the garden veneer; C. pinellus, the pearl veneer; and C. petrificellus, the common veneer. See cut under Crambidæ.

veneer-press (vē-nēr′pres), n. A special form of press used to hold veneers in position while being glued to woodwork or furniture. Various complicated forms of screw-clamps and screw-presses are used, some being fitted with steam-pipes to keep the glue soft until the veneer has adapted itself to the irregular surface to which it is to be attached.

veneer-saw (vē-nēr′sâ), n. A circular saw for cutting veneers from the solid wood, ivory, etc. It has a thin edge, and is thicker toward the center. E. H. Knight.

veneer-scraper (vē-nēr′skrā″pėr), n. A tool with an adjustable blade for dressing veneers. E. H. Knight.

venefical (vē-nef′i-kal), a. [< L. veneficus, poisonous (see venefice), + -al.] Same as veneficial.

All with spindles, timbrels, rattles, or other venefical instruments, making a confused noise.
B. Jonson, Masque of Queens.

veneficet (ven′ē-fis), n. [< L. veneficium, a poisoning, < veneficus, poisoning, < venenum, poison, + -ficus, < facere, make.] Sorcery, or the art of poisoning. Bailey, 1727.

veneficial (ven-ē-fish′al), a. [< L. veneficium, a poisoning (see venefice), + -al.] 1. Acting by poison; sorcerous. [Rare.]

As for the magical virtues in this plant [the mistletoe], and conceived efficacy unto veneficial intentions, it seemeth a pagan relick derived from the ancient druids.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 6.

2. Addicted to sorcery or poisoning.

veneficious (ven-ē-fish′us), a. [< L. veneficium, a poisoning (see venefice), + -ous.] Same as veneficial.

To sit cross-legged . . . was an old veneficious practice; and Juno is made in this posture to hinder the delivery of Alcmæna. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., v. 23.

veneficiously (ven-ē-fish′us-li), adv. By poison or witchcraft.

The intent hereof [breaking an egg-shell] was to prevent witchcraft; for, lest witches should draw or prick their names therein, and veneficiously mischief their persons, they broke the shell, as Delecampius hath observed.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., v. 23.

veneisunt, n. An old spelling of venison.

venemoust, a. An obsolete spelling of venomous.

venenate (ven′ē-nāt), v. t. [< L. venenatus, pp. of venenare, poison, < venenum, poison: see venom.] To poison; charge or infect with poison. [Rare.]

Poisoned jaws and venenated stings.
Middleton, Solomon Paraphrased, xvi.

These miasms . . . are not so energic as to venenate the entire mass of blood. Harvey. (Johnson.) venenate (ven′ē-nāt), a. [< L. venenatus, pp.: see the verb.] Infected with poison; poisoned.

By giving this in fevers after calcination, whereby the venenate parts are carried off. Woodward, On Fossils.

venenation (ven-ē-nā′shon), n. [< venenate + -ion.] 1. The act of poisoning.—2. Poison or venom.

This venenation shoots from the eye; and this way a basilisk may impoison. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

venenet (vē-nēn′), a. [Irreg. (as adj.) < L. venenum, poison: see venom.] Poisonous; venomous.

Dry air opens the surface of the earth to disincarcerate venene bodies, or to evacate them.
Harvey, On the Plague.

venenifluous (ven-ē-nif′lö-us), a. [< L. venenum, poison, + fluere, flow: see fluent.] In bot. and zoöl., flowing with poisonous juice or venom: as, the venenifluous fang of a rattlesnake. See cuts under Crotalus and viper.

Venenosa (ven-ē-nō′sä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of LL. venenosus, full of poison: see venenose.] One of three sections into which serpents (Ophidia) have been divided, according as they are venomous or otherwise, the other sections being Innocua and Suspecta. The definition of the group as having grooved fangs in the upper jaw, followed by smaller solid, hooked teeth, would make Venenosa nearly equivalent to the Proteroglypha; but if applied to poisonous snakes at large it would be equivalent to Proteroglypha and Solenoglypha together. It is disused now, except as a convenient descriptive term, like Thanatophidia. Also called Nocua.

venenoset (ven′ē-nōs), a. [< L. venenosus, poisonous: see venenous.] Full of venom; poisonous, as a serpent; belonging to the Venenosa; nocuous; thanatophidian.

Malpighi . . . demonstrates that all such tumours, where any insects are found, are raised up by some venenose liquor, which, together with their eggs, such insects shed upon the leaves. Ray, Works of Creation.

venenosityt (ven-ē-nos′i-ti), n. [= F. vénénosité = Sp. venenosidad = Pg. venenosidade = It. venenosità; < venenose + -ity.] The property or state of being venenose or poisonous.

When we pronounce the name of Giotto, our venerant thoughts are at Assisi and Padua.
Ruskin, Modern Painters, III. i., 1, note.

venerate (ven′ę-rāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. venerated, ppr. venerating. [< L. veneratus, pp. of venerari (> It. venerare = Sp. Pg. venerar = F. vénérer), worship, venerate, revere; from the same source as Venus, love: see Venus.] To regard with respect and reverence; treat as hallowed; revere; reverence.

While beings form'd in coarser mould will hate
The helping hand they ought to venerate.
Crabbe, Works, V. 214.

The Venetian merchants, compelled to seek safety in Alexandria, visited the church in which the bones of St. Mark were preserved and venerated.
C. E. Norton, Church-building in Middle Ages, p. 47.

=Syn. Worship, Reverence, etc. See adore.

veneration (ven-ę-rā′shon), n. [< OF. veneration, F. vénération = Sp. veneración = Pg. veneração = It. venerazione, < L. veneratio(n-), veneration, reverence, < venerari, venerate, revere: see venerate.] 1. The feeling of one who venerates; a high degree of respect and reverence; an exalted feeling or sentiment excited by the dignity, wisdom, and goodness of a person, or by the sacredness of his character, and, with regard to a place, by the sacred or historic associations that hallow it.

Places consecrated to a more than ordinary veneration, by being reputed to have some particular actions done in them relating to the Death and Resurrection of Christ.
Maundrell, Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 69.

Veneration is the name given to the state of mind comprehending both religious regard and a sentiment drawn out by the more commanding and august of our fellow-beings. A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 92.

2. The outward expression of reverent feeling; worship.

"They fell down and worshipped him," after the manner of the Easterlings when they do veneration to their kings. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 45.

3. In phren., the organ of adoration, reverence, or respect for what is great and good. See cut under phrenology.=Syn. 1. Reverence, Veneration, Awe, etc. See reverence.

venerative (ven′ę-rā-tiv), a. [< venerate + -ive.] Feeling veneration; reverent. [Rare.]

I for one, when a venerative youth, have felt a thrill of joy at being kindly nodded to . . . by some distinguished personage. All the Year Round, VIII. 61.

venerator (ven′ę-rā-tor), n. [= F. vénérateur = Sp. Pg. venerador = It. veneratore, < L. venerator, one who venerates, < venerari, venerate: see venerate.] One who venerates or reverences.

venesect (vē-nē-sekt'), v. [< L. vena, vein, + secare, cut: see vein and secant.] I. trans. To cut or open a vein of; phlebotomize.

II. intrans. To practise venesection: as, it was common to venesect for many diseases.

venesection (vē-nē-sek'shọn), n. [< L. vena, vein, + sectio(n-), a cutting: see section.] Bloodletting from a vein; phlebotomy. The operation may be performed on any of the superficial veins; but either the median cephalic or the basilic in the bend of the elbow is usually selected for this purpose. (See cut under median[1].) A band is tied around the arm just above the elbow, so as to cause a turgescence of the veins below, and then the vein selected is opened with a sharp lancet. When the desired amount of blood has been taken away, the band is removed, and further bleeding arrested by the application of a small compress and bandage.

> In a Quinsey he [Aretæus] used Venesection, and allow'd the Blood to flow till the Patient was ready to faint away.
> Med. Dict. (1745), quoted in Harper's Mag., LXXX. 440.
>
> It is now well understood that spoliative venesection would be the sure forerunner of disaster to the patient.
> J. M. Carnochan, Operative Surgery, p. 88.

Venesection bandage, a simple figure-of-eight bandage applied about the elbow after venesection at this point.

Venetian (vē-nē'shạn), a. and n. [Early mod. E. also Venitian, as a noun (def. 2) venytyons; < OF. Venitian, F. Vénitien = It. Veneziano, < ML. Venetianus*, < Venetia, Venice, L. Venetia, the country of the Veneti, in the territory later held by Venice.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the city, province, or former republic of Venice, in northern Italy, on the edge of the Adriatic.

> The land of the old Veneti bore the Venetian name ages before the city of Venice was in being.
> E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 4.
>
> A composition neither Byzantine nor Romanesque, unexampled hitherto, only to be called Venetian.
> C. E. Norton, Church-building in Middle Ages, p. 53.

Venetian architecture, Venetian Gothic, the style of medieval architecture elaborated in Venice between the twelfth and the early part of the sixteenth century. It combines in many respects the qualities of the arts of Byzantium, of the Italian mainland, and of transalpine Europe, but blends all these into a new style of high decorative quality and originality. The principal characteristics of this style are as follows: each story is usually graced with its own arcaded range of columns or pilasters, forming an open balcony or loggia, and separated from the other stories by conspicuous friezes or belts, often in the form of graceful balustrades; the arched windows are ornamented with small shafts at the sides, and their spandrels are often filled with rich carving; ornamental parapets are common; and the window-heads frequently show plain or pierced cusps of bold yet delicate outline and curves of great refinement. The most splendid example of the style is the famous Ducal Palace. Like all Italian Pointed architecture—the so-called Italian Gothic—the merits of the style lie chiefly in external design; the Italians never sought to master the admirable theory of arched and vaulted construction securing stability by balance of opposed pressures, which was elaborated by northern medieval architects, and raises their architecture to the highest place in the history of the art. Venetian architecture is noteworthy for its lavish use of color derived from inlaid marbles, porphyries, and other stones of rich hue, as well as of gilding and brilliant mosaic and painted decoration. It bears witness in many subtile details to the close intercourse of the Venetians with the Orient.—Venetian ball. See ball[1].—Venetian bar, needlework in imitation of heavy lace by buttonhole-stitches around a thread, producing a series of bars or bands across an open space. Dict. of Needlework.—Venetian blind, a blind made of slats of wood so connected as to overlap one another when closed, and to show a series of open spaces for the admission of light and air when opened. The term is applied especially to a hanging blind of which the slats are held together by strips of webbing or other flexible material. The pulling of a cord lifts the whole blind, the slats coming in contact with one another as they rise until all are packed closely together above the window. The pulling of another cord when the blind is down turns the slats to open or close them. In the British islands outside slatted shutters are also so called.—Venetian carpet. See carpet.—Venetian chalk. Same as French chalk (which see, under chalk).—Venetian embroidery, embroidery upon linen and similar materials, done by cutting away a great deal of the background so as to produce an open design like coarse lace, the edges of the stuff forming the pattern being stitched, and bars or brides sometimes used to steady and support the smaller leaves, etc.—Venetian enamel, an enamel used for clock- and watch-dials.—Venetian glass. See glass (with cut).—Venetian lace. See rose-point, under point[1].—Venetian long-stitch embroidery, a simple kind of worsted-work done upon open canvas. Dict. of Needlework.—Venetian mosaic. See mosaic[1], 1.—Venetian pearl, the trade-name for solid artificial pearls. See imitation pearl, under pearl.—Venetian red. See red[1].—Venetian sallet, a form of sallet in which the neck and cheeks are protected by a long broad side-piece forged in one with the skull-piece, similar to the Greek helm with cheek-pieces and without crest.—Venetian school, in painting, the school of Italian painting which arose to prominence in Venice in the fifteenth century, with the Bellinis and Carpaccio, and was preëminent through a great part of the sixteenth century, when its chief masters were Titian, Paul Veronese, Giorgione, Tintoretto, Palma Vecchio, and Lorenzo Lotto. It was above all a school of colorists; in the magnificence of its use of pigments and in technical perfection it has never been surpassed; and in every artistic quality its chief masters will always rank with the first painters of the world.—Venetian sumac. See sumac.—Venetian swell, in organ-building, a swell, or set of blinds, made after the pattern of Venetian blinds. See swell.—Venetian turpentine. See turpentine and larch.—Venetian window. See window.

venget (venj), v. t. [< ME. vengen, < OF. (and F.) venger = Sp. vengar, < L. vindicare, avenge, vindicate: see vindicate. Cf. avenge, revenge, vengeance.] 1. To avenge; take vengeance in behalf of (a person).

> Right as they han venged hem on me, right so shal I venge me upon hem. Chaucer, Tale of Melibeus.
>
> I am coming on
> To venge me as I may. Shak., Hen. V., i. 2. 292.

2. To revenge; take vengeance because of (an offense).

> Would none but I might venge my cousin's death!
> Shak., R. and J., iii. 5. 87.

vengeable† (ven'jạ-bl), a. [Early mod. E. also vengible; < OF. vengeable* (= Sp. vengable); as venge + -able.] 1. Capable of being or deserving to be revenged.

> I sought
> Upon myselfe that vengeable despight
> To punish. Spenser, F. Q., II. iv. 30.

2. Characterized by revengefulness; entertaining or displaying a desire for revenge; vengeful.

> In mallyce be not vengeable,
> As S. Mathewe doth speake.
> Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 92.
>
> Alexander . . . dyd put to vengeable deth his dere frende Clitus. Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, ii. 6.

3. Terrible; dreadful; awful; extraordinary: a hyperbolical use.

> Paulus . . . was a vengible fellow in linking matters together. Holland, tr. of Camden, p. 78. (Davies.) vengeably† (ven'jạ-bli), adv. Revengefully; in revenge.

> Charitably, lovingly, not of malice, not vengeably, not covetously. Latimer, 4th Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1594.

vengeance (ven'jans), n. [< ME. vengeance, vengeaunce, venjaunce, vengeans, vengance, vengaunce, < OF. vengeance, venjance, F. vengeance (= Sp. venganza = It. vengianza), < venger, avenge: see venge.] 1. Punishment inflicted in return for an injury or an offense. Vengeance generally implies indignation on the part of the punisher, and more or less justice in the nature of the punishment; it may also be inflicted for wrong done to others, as well as to the punisher, in which respects it is usually distinguished from revenge.

> Veniaunce, veniaunce forgine be it neuere.
> Piers Plowman (B), xvii. 288.
>
> Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord.
> Rom. xii. 19.

2†. Harm, mischief, or evil generally: formerly often used as an imprecation, especially in the phrase what a (the) vengeance!

> Whiles the eye of man did woo me,
> That could do no vengeance to me.
> Shak., As you Like it, iv. 3. 48.

What the vengeance!
Could he not speak 'em fair?
Shak., Cor., iii. 1. 262.

But what a vengeance makes thee fly?
S. Butler, Hudibras, I. iii. 213.

With a vengeance, vehemently, violently; also, extremely. [Colloq.]

The fishy fume
That drove him [Asmodeus], though enamour'd, from the spouse
Of Tobit's son, and with a vengeance sent From Media post to Egypt. Milton, P. L., iv. 170.

Manly. However, try her; put it to her.
Vernish. Ay, ay, I'll try her; put it to her home, with a Vengeance. Wycherley, Plain Dealer, v. 1.

=Syn. 1. Retribution, Retaliation, etc. See revenge.

vengeance† (ven'jans), adv. [Elliptical use of vengeance, n.] Extremely; very.

He's vengeance proud, and loves not the common people. Shak., Cor., ii. 2. 6.

I am vengeance cold, I tell thee.
Beau. and Fl., Coxcomb, ii. 2.

vengeancely† (ven'jans-li), adv. [< vengeance + *-ly*2.] With a vengeance; extremely; excessively.

I could poison him in a pot of perry;
He loves that vengeancely.
Fletcher (and another?), Prophetess, i. 3.

vengeful (venj'fûl), a. [< venge + -ful.] Vindictive; retributive; revengeful.

I pray
His vengeful sword may fall upon thy head.
Fletcher (and another), Love's Cure, v. 3.

vengefully (venj'fûl-i), adv. In a vengeful manner; vindictively.

vengefulness (venj'fûl-nes), n. Vindictiveness; revengefulness.

The two victims of his madness or of his vengefulness were removed to the London Hospital.
Daily Telegraph, June 22, 1886. (Encyc. Dict.) vengement† (venj'ment), n. [< venge + -ment.] Avengement; retribution.

He shew'd his head ther left,
And wretched life forlorne for vengement of his theft.
Spenser, F. Q., VI. iii. 18.

venger† (ven'jèr), n. [< F. vengeur = Sp. vengador, < LL. vindicator, avenger, < L. vindicare, avenge: see venge. Cf. vindicator.] An avenger.

God is a vengere of synne. Coventry Mysteries, p. 76.

His bleeding heart is in the vengers hand.
Spenser, F. Q., I. iii. 20.

vengeress† (ven'jèr-es), n. [< ME. vengeresse, < OF. vengeresse, fem. of vengeur, an avenger: see venger.] A female avenger.

This kynge alain was seke of the woundes of the spere vengeresse . . . for he was wounded thourgh bothe thyghes with that spere. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 229.

The thre goddesses, furiis and vengeressis of felonies.
Chaucer, Boëthius, iii. meter 12.

veniable† (vē'ni-a-bl), a. [< ME. veniable, < LL. veniabilis, pardonable, < L. venia, pardon: see venial.] Venial; pardonable.

In things of this nature silence commendeth history; 'tis the veniable part of things lost.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vii. 19.

veniably† (vē'ni-a-bli), adv. Pardonably; excusably.

venial (vē'ni-al), a. and n. [< ME. venial, < OF. venial, F. véniel = Sp. Pg. venial = It. veniale, < LL. venialis, pardonable, < L. venia, indulgence, remission, pardon.] I. a. 1. That may be forgiven; pardonable; not very sinful or wrong: as, a venial sin or transgression. See *sin*1, 1.

There contricioun doth but dryueth it doun in-to a venial synne. Piers Plowman (B), xiv. 92.

In our own country, a woman forfeits her place in society by what in a man is too commonly considered as an honourable distinction, and at worst as a venial error.
Macaulay, Machiavelli.

2. Excusable; that may be allowed or permitted to pass without severe censure.

They are things indifferent, whether kept or broken; Mere venial slips, that grow not near the conscience.
Fletcher, Wildgoose Chase, ii. 1.

This is a mistake, though a very venial one; the apophthegm is attributed . . . to Agasicles, not to Agesilaus.
Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, ii. 9, note.

3†. Permissible; harmless; unobjectionable.

Permitting him the while Venial discourse unblamed.
Milton, P. L., ix. 5.

=Syn. 1 and 2. Venial, Excusable, Pardonable. Excusable and pardonable are applied to things small and great, but pardonable primarily applies to greater offenses, as pardoning is a more serious act than excusing. Excusable may be applied where the offense is only in seeming. Venial applies to things actually done; the others may apply to infirmities and the like. Venial, by theological use, is often opposed, more or less clearly, to mortal.

II.† n. A venial sin or offense.

It . . . gently blanches over the breaches of God's Law with the name of venials and favourable titles of diminution. Bp. Hall, Dissuasive from Popery.

veniality (vē-ni-al'i-ti), n. [= Sp. venialidad = Pg. venialidade; as venial + -ity.] The property of being venial.

They palliate wickedness, with the fair pretence of veniality. Bp. Hall, Sermon at Westminster, April 5, 1628.

venially (vē'ni-al-i), adv. In a venial manner; pardonably.

venialness (vē'ni-al-nes), n. The state of being excusable or pardonable.

Venice crown. In her., a bearing representing the cornu or peaked cap of the Doge of Venice, decorated with a rim of gold like a coronet, surrounding the brow of the wearer.

Venice glass, mallow, point, soap, sumac, turpentine, white, etc. See glass, etc.

Venice treacle. See theriac.

Veni Creator (vē'nī krē-ā'tor). [So called from the first words, "Veni Creator Spiritus," 'Come, Creator Spirit.' L.: veni, 2d pers. sing. impv. of venire, come; creator, creator.] A hymn to the Holy Ghost, used in the Roman Catholic Church in the daily office on Whitsunday and during the octave, also at coronations, synods, ordination of priests, consecration of bishops, creation of popes, and translation of relics. In Sarum use it also formed part of the priest's preparation before mass. In the Anglican Prayer-book two free versions of it are given ("Come, Holy Ghost, our souls inspire," and "Come, Holy Ghost, eternal God"), to be used at the ordination of priests and consecration of bishops, and it is also used at synods, etc. Its authorship is commonly attributed to Charlemagne, but it is certainly older, and may be referred with more probability to St. Gregory the Great. Also, more fully, Veni Creator Spiritus.

venim†, venime†, n. Old spellings of venom.

venimous†, a. An obsolete form of venomous.

veniplex (vē'ni-pleks), n. [NL., < L. vena, vein, + plexus, a network: see plexus.] A venous plexus, or plexiform arrangement of veins forming an anastomotic network. Coues.

veniplexed (vē'ni-plekst), a. [< veniplex + *-ed*2.] Formed into a venous plexus or network. Coues.

venire facias (vē-nī'rē fā'si-as). [So called from these words in the writ, lit. 'cause to come.' L.: venire, come; facias, 2d pers. sing. pres. subj. (as impv.) of facere, make, do, cause.] In law, a writ or precept directed to the sheriff, requiring him to cause a jury or a number of jurors to come or appear in court, for the trial of causes. Also, in common legal parlance, venire.—Venire facias de novo, or venire de novo, in law, a new writ for summoning a jury anew; the process used at common law when, by reason of some irregularity or defect apparent on the record, a party was entitled to a new trial as matter of right. The motion for a new trial in modern practice may be made on the same grounds, and also on other grounds, including some that rest in judicial discretion.

venire-man (vē-nī'rē-man), n. A man summoned under a venire facias for jury service.

venison (ven'zn or ven'i-zn), n. [Formerly also ven'son; < ME. venison, venysoun, veneson, venèisun, < OF. veneisun, venaison, venoison*, F. venaison, venison, the flesh of the deer and boar, the principal objects of the chase, < L. venatio(n-), hunting, also the product of the chase, game, < venari, hunt: see *venation*1, of which venison is thus a doublet. For the form and the dissyllabic pronunciation, cf. menison, menson, ult. < L. manatio(n-).] 1†. A beast or beasts of the chase, as deer and other large game.

A theef of venysoun, that hath forlaft
His likerousnesse and al his olde craft,
Can kepe a forest best of any man.
Chaucer, Physician's Tale, l. 83.

"Come, kill [me] a ven'son," said bold Robin Hood,
"Come, kill me a good fat deer."
Robin Hood and the Bishop of Hereford (Child's Ballads, [V. 294).

2. The flesh of such game used as food; specifically, the flesh of animals of the deer tribe: now the common use of the word.

Shall we go and kill us venison?
Shak., As you Like it, ii. 1. 21.

A fair ven'son pastye brought she out presentlye.
King and Miller of Mansfield (Child's Ballads, VIII. 36).

Thanks, my Lord, for your venison, for finer or fatter
Never rang'd in a forest or smok'd in a platter.
Goldsmith, Haunch of Venison.

Fallow venison, the flesh of the fallow deer.—Red venison, the flesh of the red deer.

Venison both red and fallow.
Fuller, Pisgah Sight, I. v. § 2.

Venite (vē-nī'tē), n. [So called from the first words, "Venite exultemus," 'O come, let us sing unto the Lord.' L. venite, 2d pers. pl. impv. of venire, come.] 1. In liturgics, the 95th Psalm. In the Roman and other Western arrangements of the daily office this psalm is said at matins, accompanied by the invitatory and followed, after a hymn, by the appointed psalms of the hour. In the Anglican Prayer-book it is also said daily at matins or morning prayer before the psalms of the Psalter, except on the nineteenth day of the month, when it begins the portion for the day in the Psalter, and at Easter, when it is replaced by a special anthem. Also, more fully, Venite exultemus.

2. A musical setting, usually in chant form, of the above canticle.

venivel, venivela (ven'i-vel, ven-i-vē'lä), n. [E. Ind.] The velvetleaf, or spurious pareira brava, Cissampelos Pareira.

venjet†, v. An old spelling of venge.

vennel (ven'el), n. [Formerly also venall; < F. venelle, a small street.] An alley, or narrow street. [Scotch.]

Some ruins remain in the vennel of the Maison Dieu or hospitium, founded by William of Brechin in 1256.
Encyc. Brit., IV. 242.

venom (ven'um), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also venome, venim, venime, venym; < ME. venim, venym, venyme, fenim, < OF. venim, venin, also velin, F. venin = Pr. vere, veri = Sp. Pg. veneno = It. veleno, veneno, < L. venenum, poison.] I. n. 1. Poison in general: now an archaic use.

Zif Venym or Poysoun be broughte in presence of the Dyamand, anon it begynnethe to wexe moyst and for to swete. Mandeville, Travels, p. 159.

Full from the fount of Joy's delicious springs
Some bitter o'er the flowers its bubbling venom flings.
Byron, Childe Harold, i. 82.

2. The poisonous fluid secreted by some animals in a state of health, as a means of offense and defense, and introduced into the bodies of their victims by biting, as in the case of many serpents, or stinging, as in the case of scorpions, etc. In vertebrates venom is usually a modified saliva secreted by glands morphologically identical with ordinary salivary glands: and the normal saliva of various animals acquires at times, or under some circumstances, an extremely venomous quality, as in the rabies of various beasts. Venom is normal to few vertebrates, notably all thanatophidian serpents, and one or two lizards, as the Gila monster. Venom-glands are connected with the spines of the head or fins of a few fishes. Venom of extreme virulence is injected with the bite of a few spiders (see Latrodectus, and cut under spider), and the punctures made by the claws or telson of centipeds and scorpions are envenomed. An acrid or irritating fluid, classable as venom, is injected with the sting of many insects (see cases cited under *sting*1).

Of alle fretynge venymes the vilest is the scorpion;
May no medecyne amende the place ther he styngeth.
Piers Plowman (C), xxi. 158.

Or what the cross dire-looking planet smites,
Or hurtful worm with canker'd venom bites.
Milton, Arcades, l. 53.

3. Something that blights, cankers, or embitters; injurious influence; hence, spite; malice; malignity; virulency.

What with Venus, and other oppressioun
Of houses, Mars his Venim is adoun,
That Ypermistra dar nat handle a knyf.
Chaucer, Good Women, l. 2593.

The venom of such looks, we fairly hope,
Have lost their quality. Shak., Hen. V., v. 2. 18.

4†. Coloring material; dye.

They cowde nat medle the bryhte fleeses of the contre of Seryens with the venym of Tyrie.
Chaucer, Boëthius, ii. meter 5.

II.† a. Envenomed; venomous; poisonous.

In our lande growith pepper in forestis full of snakes and other venym beestes.
R. Eden (First Books on America, ed. Arber, p. xxxiv.).

Thou art . . .
Mark'd by the destinies to be avoided,
As venom toads, or lizard's dreadful stings.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., ii. 2. 138.

My venom eyes
Strike innocency dead at such a distance.
Beau. and Fl., Coxcomb, v. 2.

venom (ven'um), v. [Early mod. E. venome, venime; < ME. venymen, venynen, by apheresis from envenimen, < OF. envenimer, poison (see envenom); in part directly from the noun venom.] I. trans. To envenom; infect with poison.

The venomed vengeance ride upon our swords.
Shak., T. and C., v. 3. 47.

Here boldly spread thy hands, no venom'd weed
Dares blister them.
Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess, iii. 1.

Since I must Through Brothers' periuric dye, O let me venome
Their Soules with curses!
Tourneur, Revenger's Tragedy, iii. 4.

Its bite [that of Conus aulicus] produces a venomed wound accompanied by acute pain.
A. Adams, quoted in Stand. Nat. Hist., I. 336.

II.† intrans. To become as if infected with venom.

Take out the temporal sting, that it shall not venom and fester. Jer. Taylor, Ductor Dubitantium. (Latham.) venom-albumin (ven'um-al-bū'min), n. The albumin of snake-poison.

venom-duct (ven'um-dukt), n. The duct which conveys venom from the sac or gland where it is secreted to the tooth or fang whence it is discharged.

venomer (ven'um-ėr), n. [< venom + -er[1].] A poisoner. [Rare.]

People of noble family would have found a sensitive goblet of this sort [Murano glass] as sovereign against the arts of venomers as an exclusive diet of boiled eggs.
Howells, Venetian Life, xii.

venom-fang (ven'um-fang), n. One of the long, sharp, conical teeth of the upper jaw of a venomous serpent, by means of which a poisonous fluid is injected into a punctured wound. Such a fang is firmly attached to the maxillary bone, and may be thrown forward or laid flat by a peculiar mechanism by which the bones of the upper jaw change their relative position. Such a tooth is either grooved (as in Proteroglypha) or so folded upon itself as to form a tube (as in Solenoglypha) for the conveyance of venom, being also connected with the duct of the receptacle which contains the fluid. The mechanism of the bones is such that opening the mouth widely causes erection of the venom-fang, while the forcible closure of the mouth upon the object bitten causes the injection of the venom into the wound by muscular pressure upon the venom-sac. Venom-fangs are a single pair or several pairs. Also called poison-tooth. See cuts under Crotalus and viper.

venom-gland (ven'um-gland), n. Any gland which secretes venom, mostly a modified salivary gland.

venom-globulin (ven'um-glob″ū-lin), n. The globulin of snake-poison.—Water venom-globulin. See water.

venom-mouthed (ven'um-moutht), a. Having a venomous or envenomed mouth or bite; speaking as if venomously; slanderous; scandalous.

This butcher's cur is venom-mouth'd, and I Have not the power to muzzle him.
Shak., Hen. VIII., i. 1. 120.

venomosalivary (ven″ō-mō-sal'i-vā-ri), a. [Irreg. < venom + salivary.] Venomous, as saliva; of or pertaining to venomous saliva.

I find that it is even easy to see the venomosalivary duct [of the mosquito] from the outside, shining through the skin at the base of the head and neck in the undissected specimen. Amer. Nat., XXII. 886.

venomous (ven'um-us), a. [Early mod. E. also venimous, venemous; < ME. venimous, venymous, < OF. venimous*, venimeux, venemouse, F. venimeux, also (after L.) vénéneux = Pr. verenos, verinos, also venenos = Sp. Pg. venenoso = It. velenoso, venenoso, < LL. venenosus, poisonous, venomous, < L. venenum, poison, venom: see venom. Cf. venenous, venenose.] 1. Full of venom; noxious or hurtful by means or reason of venom; venenose; poisonous: as, a venomous reptile or insect; a venomous bite.

It is alle deserte and fulle of Dragouns and grete Serpentes, and fulle of dyverse venymouse Bestes alle abouten.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 41.

The biting of a Pike is venomous, and hard to be cured.
I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 132.

2. Hence, noxious; virulent; extremely hurtful or injurious; poisonous in any way.

I ne telle of laxatyves no store,
For they ben venimous, I wot it wel;
I hem defye, I love hem nevere a del.
Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 335.

Thy tears are salter than a younger man's,
And venomous to thine eyes. Shak., Cor., iv. 1. 23.

Venemous thorns, that are so sharp and keen,
Bear flowers, we see, full fresh and fair of hue.
Wyatt, That Pleasure is mixed with every Pain.

3. Very spiteful or hateful; virulent; malignant; intended or intending to do harm: as, venomous eyes or looks; a venomous attack; venomous enemies.—Venomous serpents or snakes. See Ophidia, Nocua, Proteroglypha, serpent, snake, Solenoglypha, Venenosa, thanatophidia, and the family names cited under serpent.—Venomous spiders. See katipo, Latrodectus, malmignatte, and cut under spider.=Syn. 3. Malignant, spiteful.

venomously (ven'um-us-li), adv. With venom or poison; in a venomous manner; malignantly; spitefully. Shak., Lear, iv. 3. 48.

venomousness (ven'um-us-nes), n. The state or character of being venomous, in any sense; poisonousness; malignity; spitefulness.

venom-peptone (ven'um-pep″tōn), n. The peptone of snake-poison.

venom-sac (ven'um-sak), n. The structure on each side of the head of a venomous serpent, near the articulation of the lower jaw, which secretes and contains the poisonous fluid, and from which the fluid is conveyed by a duct to the venom-fang.

venosal (vē-nō'sạl), a. Of the nature of a vein; venous.

Its office [that of the lung] is to cool the heart, by sending ayre unto it by the Venosal Artery.
Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 19.

venose (vē'nōs), a. [= Sp. Pg. It. venoso, < L. venosus, full of veins, < vena, vein: see vein. Cf. venous.] 1. In bot., having numerous veins or branching network; veiny: as, a venose or reticulated leaf.—2. In zoöl. and anat., same as venous.

venose-costate (vē'nōs-kos″tāt), a. In bot., between ribbed and veined; having raised veins approaching ribs.

venosity (vē-nos'i-ti), n. [< venose + -ity.] 1. Venose state, quality, or character.—2. A condition in which the arterial blood is imperfectly oxygenated, and partakes of some of the characteristics of venous blood.

A rapid increase in the venosity of the blood.
Science, VII. 533.

3. A disturbance of equilibrium between the two circulatory systems, the veins being unduly filled at the expense of the arteries; general venous congestion.

★venous (vē'nus), a. [< L. venosus, full of veins, < vena, vein: see vein. Cf. venose, veinous.] 1. Of or pertaining to veins; full of veins; contained in veins; veined; venose: as, the venous system; venous blood or circulation; a venous plexus, sinus, or radicle.—2. In entom., having veins or nervures; venose or veined, as an insect's wing.—Venous blood, the blood contained in the veins and right side of the heart. It is of a dark-red color, and contains carbonic acid and other waste and nutritive products, which vary in kind and amount in different regions of the body. The venous blood is driven from the right auricle into the right ventricle of the heart, thence through the pulmonary artery into the lungs, where it is oxygenated and purified, and returned through the pulmonary veins to the left auricle of the heart. In the fetus venous blood passes from the hypogastric arteries along the umbilical arteries, and so on to the placenta, where it is arterialized and returned by the umbilical vein or veins; and there is a direct communication between the right and left auricles of the heart.—Venous calculus. Same as veinstone, 2.—Venous canal (ductus venosus), a fetal vein passing from the point of bifurcation of the umbilical vein to the inferior vena cava. It becomes obliterated soon after birth, and then remains as a fibrous cord.—Venous circulation, the flow of blood through the veins. See circulation of the blood, under circulation.—Venous congestion or hyperemia, engorgement of the veins of a part, due to obstruction of the venous circulation. Venous hyperemia is more strictly the engorgement of the subcutaneous veins, or superficial venous congestion.—Venous duct. See ductus venosus, under ductus.—Venous hemorrhage, bleeding from a vein. It is distinguished from arterial hemorrhage by the darker color of the blood and by the fact that it occurs in a steady stream, and not in forcible jets, as when an artery is opened.—Venous hum. See hum[1].—Venous plexus. See plexus.—Venous pulse, a pulsation occurring in a vein, especially that which exists normally in the jugular veins.—Venous radicles, the finest beginnings of the venous system, continuous with the capillaries. Sometimes erroneously written venous radicals.—Venous sinus. (a) One of the various large veins formed in the substance of the dura mater. See the distinctive names under sinus. (b) A natural dilatation of a vein, or a cavity into which two or more veins empty in common. In different cases such a sinus may correspond to the auricle of a heart, to a cavity communicating with a heart, as a caval vein, or to a cavity inclosing a heart, as the so-called pericardium of some invertebrates.

venously (vē'nus-li), adv. In a venous manner; as respects the veins or venous circulation.

The membranes of the brain were venously congested.
Lancet, 1890, I. 751.

★vent[1] (vent), n. [Early mod. E. vente; an altered form of fent, < ME. fente, < OF. fente, a slit, cleft, chink: see fent. The alteration of fent to vent was not due to the dial. change shown in vat for fat, vixen for fixen, etc., but to confusion with F. vent. wind (see vent[2]), as if orig. 'an air-hole.' A similar confusion appears in the history of vent[2] and vent[3], which have been more or less mixed with each other and with vent[1].] 1. A small aperture leading out of or into some inclosed space; any small hole or opening made for passage.

Through little vents and crannies of the place
The wind wars with his torch. Shak., Lucrece, l. 310.

Now he flings about his burning heat,
As in a furnace an ambitious fire
Whose vent is stopt. B. Jonson, Volpone, ii. 2.

Great Builder of mankind, why hast thou sent Such swelling floods, and made so small a vent?
Quarles, Emblems, iii. 8.

Between the jaw and ear the jav'lin went;

Abbreviated V. or v.—2. In entom., one of the segments of the abdomen as seen from beneath, especially in Coleoptera. They are distinguished as first, second, etc., counting backward. See urite, uromere.

ventralis (ven-trā'lis), n.; pl. ventrales (-lēz). [NL.: see ventral.] In ichth., a ventral fin.

ventrally (ven'tral-i), adv. In a ventral situation or direction; on or toward the belly; with respect to the venter.

ventralmost (ven'tral-mōst), a. Nearest to the ventral aspect of the body.

ventralward, ventralwards (ven'tral-wärd, -wärdz), adv. [< ventral + -ward, -wards.] Same as ventrad.

The first fold . . . sends off in the course of the third day a branch or bud-like process from its anterior edge. This branch, starting from near the dorsal beginning of the fold, runs ventralwards and forwards.
Foster and Balfour, Embryol., p. 164.

ventric (ven'trik), a. [< L. venter, belly, + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the stomach. [Rare.]

"Magister artis . . . venter," says Persius, the art of accurate timekeeping is ventric.
Mortimer Collins, Thoughts in my Garden, I. 41.

My ventricle digests what is in it. Sir M. Hale.

2. The womb; the productive organ, literally or figuratively.

Begot in the ventricle of memory.
Shak., L. L. L., iv. 2. 70.

3. In anat. and zoöl., some small cavity of the body; a hollow part or organ; a ventriculus: variously applied.—Chylific ventricle. See chylific.—Cornua of the ventricles of the brain. See cornu.—Hypoarian ventricle. See hypoarian.—Olfactory ventricle, a cavity in the olfactory lobe of the brain, continuous with the lateral ventricle. It exists normally in the fetus, but is only occasionally found in the adult.—Pineal ventricle. See pineal.—Sylvian ventricle. See Sylvian[2].—Ventricle of Arantius, that part of the fourth ventricle of the brain which extends down into the spinal cord and forms the upper part of the central canal.—Ventricle of the cerebellum, the fourth ventricle of the brain; the metepicœlia.—Ventricle of the corpus callosum, a furrow between the upper surface of the great transverse commissure of the brain and the gyrus fornicatus, or lip of each hemisphere, which rests upon the corpus callosum.—Ventricle of the larynx, a fossa on either side, between the false and true vocal cords of that side, which leads up by a narrow opening into the laryngeal pouch, or sacculus laryngis.—Ventricles of the brain, a series of connecting cavities, containing fluid, within the brain, continuous with the central cavity of the spinal cord. They are the remains of the original neural canal, formed by a folding over of the epiblast. The lateral ventricles are found one in each hemisphere; they communicate with each other and with the third ventricle through the foramen of Monro. The third ventricle lies between the optic thalami. It communicates with the fourth ventricle through the aqueduct of Sylvius. The fourth ventricle lies between the cerebellum and the pons and medulla. The so-called fifth ventricle, or pseudocœle, has no connection with the other cerebral ventricles, being of a different nature and simply a small interval between the right and left layers of the septum lucidum. The cerebral ventricles or cœliæ have lately been systematically named in a morphological vocabulary which is irrespective of the peculiarities of the human brain, and based on the encephalomeres of vertebrates. See aula, 2, cœlia, diacœlia, encephalocœle, epicœlia, mesocœlia, metacœlia, metepicœlia, procœlia, rhinocœlia, and cuts under encephalon, Rana, and Petromyzontidæ.—Ventricles of the heart, the two chambers in the heart which receive the blood from the auricles and propel it into the arteries. The right ventricle forces the venous blood coming from the right auricle into the pulmonary artery, and thence through the lungs. The left ventricle receives the arterial blood from the left auricle and propels it through the aorta and the rest of the systemic arterial system. See cuts under heart, lung, Polyplacophora, and Lamellibranchiata.

ventricornu (ven-tri-kôr'nū), n.; pl. ventricornua (-nū-ä). [NL., < L. venter, belly, + cornu, horn.] The ventral or anterior horn or curved extension of gray matter in the substance of the spinal cord. See second cut under spinal.

ventricornual (ven-tri-kôr'nū-al), a. [< ventricornu + -al.] Of or pertaining to the ventricornu. Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, VIII. 528.

ventricose (ven'tri-kōs), a. [< L. venter (ventr-), belly, + -ic + -ose.] 1. Having a large abdomen; corpulent.—2. In bot., swelling out in the middle; swelling unequally, or inflated on one side; distended; inflated; bellied: as, a ventricose corolla or perianth.—3. In conch., ventricous. See ventricous, 1 (b).

ventricous (ven'tri-kus), a. [< L. venter (ventr-), belly, + -ic + -ous.] 1. In zoöl. and anat.: (a) Bellying; resembling a belly; swelled up or out; distended; ventricose. (b) In conch., having the whorls or the valves of the shell swollen or strongly convex. See cuts under Dolium, Turbo, bivalve, and Pectinidæ.—2. In bot., same as ventricose.

ventricular (ven-trik'ū-lär), a. [= F. ventriculaire = Sp. ventricular = It. ventricolare, < NL. ventricularis*, < L. ventriculus, ventricle: see ventricle.] 1. Of or pertaining to a ventricle, in any sense; ventriculous: as, a ventricular cavity of the brain or heart; ventricular walls, lining, orifice; ventricular systole or diastole.—2. Bellied or bellying; distended; ventricous. [Rare.]—Ventricular aqueduct. Same as aquæductus Sylvii (which see, under aquæductus).—Ventricular bands of the larynx, the false vocal cords.—Ventricular septum. (a) Same as septum lucidum (which see, under septum). (b) The muscular wall separating the two ventricles of the heart.—Ventricular space, the system of central communicating cavities, containing fluid, in the cerebrospinal axis. It comprises the lateral, third, and fourth ventricles of the brain and the channels connecting them, and the primitive central canal of the spinal cord—the neurocœle—usually obliterated in the spinal cord, where, however, a part of it may persist as the rhombocœlia.

ventriculi, n. Plural of ventriculus.

ventriculite (ven-trik'ū-līt), n. [< NL. ventriculites, < L. ventriculus, ventricle: see ventricle.] A fossil sponge of the family Ventriculitidæ; a so-called "petrified mushroom." They are of various shapes—fungiform, cup-like, tubular, or funnel-shaped—and abound in the Cretaceous.

Ventriculites (ven-trik-ū-lī'tēz), n. [NL. (Mantell): see ventriculite.] A genus of fossil silicious sponges, typical of the family Ventriculitidæ.

ventriculitic (ven-trik-ū-lit'ik), a. [< ventriculite + -ic.] Pertaining to or containing ventriculites.

Ventriculitidæ (ven-trik-ū-lit'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Ventriculites + -idæ.] A family of fossil hexactinellidan sponges, typified by the genus Ventriculites.

ventriculobulbous (ven-trik#ū-lō-bul'bus), a. [< L. ventriculus, ventricle, + bulbus, bulb.] In ichth., pertaining to the cardiac ventricle and the aortic bulb, as the orifice between them.

ventriculose (ven-trik'ū-lōs), a. [< LL. ventriculosus, of the belly, < L. ventriculus, belly.] In bot., minutely ventricose.

ventriculous (ven-trik'ū-lus), a. Same as ventricular.

ventriculus (ven-trik'ū-lus), n.; pl. ventriculi (-lī). [L.: see ventricle.] In anat. and zoöl., a ventricle, in any sense; a loculus. Specifically—(a) The true stomach or proper digestive cavity of some animals, as birds and insects. See proventriculus. (b) In sponges, the general interior space or body-cavity, as in Ascetta. See cut under sponge.—Ventriculus bulbosus, the muscular gizzard of a bird; the gigerium.—Ventriculus callosus, the gizzard.—Ventriculus communis, the common cavity of the brain; the aula.—Ventriculus conarii. Same as recessus infrapinealis.—Ventriculus dexter, the right ventricle of the heart.—Ventriculus Galeni, the ventricle of the larynx.—Ventriculus glandulosus. Same as proventriculus, 1.—Ven- triculus lateralis, the lateral ventricle of the cerebrum; the lativentriculus or procœlia.—Ventriculus Morgagnii, the ventricle of the larynx.—Ventriculus olfactorius, the olfactory ventricle; the rhinocœlia.—Ventriculus opticus, the optic ventricle; the mesocœlia.—Ventriculus quartus, the fourth ventricle, or ventricle of the cerebellum; the metacœlia (metepicœlia).—Ventriculus quintus, the fifth ventricle of the brain; the cavity of the septum lucidum; the pseudocœlia.—Ventriculus sinister, the left ventricle of the heart.—Ventriculus succenturiatus, the duodenum.—Ventriculus tertius, the third ventricle of the brain; the diacœlia.—Ventriculus tricornis, the three-horned ventricle; the lateral ventricle of the cerebrum. Also called ventriculus lateralis and, more properly, procœlia.

ventricumbent (ven-tri-kum'bent), a. [< L. venter (ventr-), belly, + cumben(t-)s*, ppr. of cumbere*, lie down: see cumbent.] Lying upon the belly; prone: opposed to dorsicumbent. Wilder and Gage, Anat. Tech., p. 36. [Rare.]

ventriduct (ven'tri-dukt), v. t. [< L. venter (ventr-), belly, + ductus, pp. of ducere, lead, conduct.] To bring or carry (the head of an animal) to or toward the belly: opposed to dorsiduct. Wilder and Gage. [Rare.]

ventrilocution (ven″tri-lō-kū'shon), n. [< L. venter (ventr-), belly, + locutio(n-), < loqui, speak. Cf. ventriloquy.] Ventriloquism.

ventriloque (ven'tri-lōk), a. [< F. ventriloque, a ventriloquist: see ventriloquous.] Ventriloquial. Hood, Irish Schoolmaster.

ventriloquial (ven-tri-lō'kwi-al), a. [< ventriloqu-y + -al.] Of or pertaining to, or using, ventriloquism.

The symphony began, and was soon afterwards followed by a faint kind of ventriloquial chirping. . . . "Sing out!" shouted one gentleman. . . . "I can't," replied Miss Amelia. Dickens, Sketches, Characters, viii.

Ventriloquial monkey, a South American squirrel-monkey of the genus Callithrix.

ventriloquially (ven-tri-lō'kwi-al-i), adv. In a ventriloquial manner. Medical News, LII. 278.

ventriloquism (ven-tril'ō-kwizm), n. [< ventriloqu-y + -ism.] The act, art, or practice of speaking or uttering sounds in such a manner that the voice appears to come, not from the person speaking, but from a distance, as from the opposite side of the room or from the cellar. Ventriloquism differs from ordinary speaking mainly in the mode of respiration. A very full inspiration is taken, which is breathed out slowly and gradually, the sound of the voice being dexterously modified and diminished by the muscles of the larynx and the palate. At the same time the lips of the performer are scarcely moved, and the deception is still further facilitated by the attention of the auditors being directed to the pretended source of the voice. Ventriloquism was known to the ancient Greeks as well as to the Romans.

What is called ventriloquism, . . . and is not uncommonly ascribed to a mysterious power of producing voice somewhere else than in the larynx, depends entirely upon the accuracy with which the performer can simulate sounds of a particular character, and upon the skill with which he can suggest a belief in the existence of the causes of these sounds. Thus, if the ventriloquist desire to create the belief that a voice issues from the bowels of the earth, he imitates, with great accuracy, the tones of such a half-stifled voice, and suggests the existence of some one uttering it by directing his answers and gestures towards the ground. The gestures and tones are such as would be produced by a given cause; and, no other cause being apparent, the mind of the bystander insensibly judges the suggested cause to exist. Huxley.

ventriloquist (ven-tril'ō-kwist), n. [As ventriloqu-y + -ist.] One who practises or is skilled in ventriloquism; one who speaks in such a manner that his voice appears to come from some distant place or other quarter.

I regard truth as a divine ventriloquist: I care not from whose mouth the sounds are supposed to proceed, if only the words are audible and intelligible. Coleridge, Biog. Lit., ix.

ventriloquistic (ven-tril-ō-kwis'tik), a. [< ventriloquist + -ic.] Of or pertaining to ventriloquism or ventriloquists; ventriloquial. H. O. Forbes, Eastern Archipelago, p. 72.

ventriloquize (ven-tril'ō-kwīz), v. i.; pret. and pp. ventriloquized, ppr. ventriloquizing. [< ventriloqu-y + -ize.] To practise ventriloquism; speak like a ventriloquist. Also spelled ventriloquise.

ventriloquous (ven-tril'ō-kwus), a. [= F. ventriloque, < LL. ventriloquus, one who apparently speaks from his belly, < L. venter (ventr-), belly, + loqui, speak.] Same as ventriloquial. The Century, XXXVI. 719.

ventriloquy (ven-tril'ō-kwi), n. [= F. ventriloquie, < LL. ventriloquus, one who apparently speaks from the belly, < L. venter (ventr-), belly, + loqui, speak.] Same as ventriloquism.

ventrimesal (ven-tri-mes'al), a. [< ventrimes(on) + -al.] Of or pertaining to the ventrimeson; situated at or upon the ventrimeson. Also ventromesal.

ventrimeson (ven-tri-mes'on), n. [NL. (Wilder and Gage, 1882), < L. venter (ventr-), belly, + NL. meson, q. v.] The ventral border of the meson, opposite the dorsimeson. See meson.

ventripotent (ven-trip'ō-tent), a. [< L. venter (ventr-), belly, + potent(t-)s, ppr. of posse, be able, have power.] Of great gastronomic capacity. [Rare and humorous.]

The ventripotent mulatto [Dumas], the great eater, worker, earner, and waster, the man of much and witty laughter, the man of the great heart and alas! of the doubtful honesty, is a figure not yet clearly set before the world; he still awaits a sober and yet genial portrait. R. L. Stevenson, Gossip on a Novel of Dumas's.

ventripyramid (ven-tri-pir'a-mid), n. [< L. venter (ventr-), belly, + pyramis, pyramid.] Same as pyramid, 4.

ventrocystorrhaphy (ven″trō-sis-tor'a-fi), n. [< L. venter (ventr-), belly, + Gr. κύστις, bladder (see cyst), + ῥαφή, seam, < ῥάπτειν, sew.] An operation for the opening of an intra-abdominal cyst and providing for the free discharge of its contents, by previously attaching its wall to that of the abdomen, thus practically converting it into a surface-tumor.

ventrodorsally (ven-trō-dôr'sal-i), adv. In a dorsal direction; from belly to back; dorsad.

ventrofixation (ven″trō-fik-sā'shon), n. In surg., the attachment by operation of any of the viscera, especially the uterus (for correction of displacement), to the abdominal wall.

ventro-inguinal (ven-trō-ing'gwi-nal), a. Common to the belly and groin; pertaining to the abdominal cavity and the inguinal canal: as, the spermatic cord becomes ventro-inguinal during the descent of the testis.—Ventro-inguinal hernia, direct inguinal hernia.

ventrolateral (ven-trō-lat'e-ral), a. Of or pertaining to the ventral and lateral sides of the body: as, the ventrolateral muscles.

ventrolaterally (ven-trō-lat'e-ral-i), adv. In a ventrolateral position or direction; to, at, or on the side of the belly. Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 95.

ventromesal (ven-trō-mes'al), a. Same as ventrimesal.

ventrosity (ven-tros'i-ti), n. [< LL. ventrosus, ventriosus, having a large belly, + -ity.] Corpulence.

ventrotomy (ven-trot'ō-mi), n. [< L. venter (ventr-), belly, + Gr. -τομία, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] In surg., abdominal section; laparotomy.

vent-searcher (vent'sèr″chèr), n. A small wire having a curved or hooked point, designed to detect cavities in the vent of a gun.

vent-stopper (vent'stop″èr), n. In ordnance, a plug or cap used to close a vent-hole. E. H. Knight.

vent-tube (vent'tūb), n. In bacteriology, a ventilating tube of some culture-tubes; a slender straight or curved tube attached to the upper part of the main tube, and containing the plug of raw cotton. Dolley, Bacteria Investigation, p. 62.

venture (ven'tūr), n. [< ME. venture, ventur; by apheresis from aventure, adventure: see adventure.] 1. An undertaking of chance or danger; the risking of something upon an event which cannot be foreseen with certainty; the staking of something; a hazard.

I shall yow telle of a ventur certeyn,
And that a strange, if it please yow to here.
Generydes (E. E. T. S.), l. 1522.

To desperate ventures and assured destruction.
Shak., Rich. III., v. 3. 319.

2. Specifically, a scheme for making gain by way of trade; a commercial speculation.

I, in this venture, double gains pursue,
And laid out all my stock to purchase you.
Dryden.

3. The thing put to hazard; a stake; a risk; particularly, something sent to sea in trade.

My ventures are not in one bottom trusted.
Shak., M. of V., i. 1. 42.

May every merchant here see safe his ventures!
Fletcher, Beggars' Bush, v. 2.

Certainly Aristophanes had no Venture at Sea, or else must think the Trident signified but very little.
J. Collier, Short View (ed. 1698), p. 39.

4. Chance; hap; contingency; luck; an event that is not or cannot be foreseen.

Yef thow haddest do alle the gode dedes of the worlde, and thyn ende were euell, thow were in a venture all for to lese. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), i. 93.

Venture hath place in love.
Earl of Oxford (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 599).

At a venture, at hazard; without seeing the end or mark, or without foreseeing the issue; at random.

So fourth she went and left all other thing,
At a venture your welefare for to see.

A certain man drew a bow at a venture. 1 Ki. xxii. 34.

=Syn. 1. Hazard, etc. See risk[1].

venture (ven'tūr), v.; pret. and pp. ventured, ppr. venturing. [By apheresis from aventure, adventure, v.] I. intrans. 1. To dare; have courage or presumption, as to do, undertake, or say.

To whom alone I venture to complain.
Congreve, To a Candle.

2. To run a hazard or risk; try the chance; make a venture; expose one's life, fortune, etc.

There is also a Rope stretched cross the Street brest high, and no man may pass this place till he is examin'd, unless he will venture to be soundly bang'd by the Watch.
Dampier, Voyages, II. i. 77.

Shal. Break their talk, Mistress Quickly; my kinsman shall speak for himself.
Slen. I'll make a shaft or a bolt on 't: 'slid, 'tis but venturing. Shak., M. W. of W., iii. 4. 25.

Let him venture
In some decay'd crare of his own.
Beau. and Fl., Captain, i. 2.

You have greatly ventured; but all must do so who would greatly win. Byron.

To venture at, to venture on or upon, to dare to engage in; attempt without any certainty of success.

II. trans. 1. To expose to hazard; risk; stake.

We all are soldiers, and all venture lives.
Beau. and Fl., King and No King, i. 1.

If every hair of my head were a man, in this quarrel I would venture them all.
Quoted in Macaulay's Hist. Eng., v.

2. To run the hazard of; expose one's self to.

I should venture purgatory for 't.
Shak., Othello, iv. 3. 77.

No, no, I'll walk late no more; I ought less to venture it than other people, and so I was told.
Swift, Journal to Stella, June 30, 1711.

3. To put or send on a venture or commercial speculation.

The catle were ye best goods, for ye other, being ventured ware, were neither at ye best (some of them) nor at ye best prises. Bradford, Plymouth Plantation, p. 201.

4. To confide in; rely on; trust. [Rare.]

A man would be well enough pleased to buy silks of one whom he would not venture to feel his pulse.
Addison, Spectator, No. 21.

venturer (ven'tūr-èr), n. [< venture + -er[1].] 1. One who ventures or adventures; one who risks life, property, etc.; one who causes risk; one who puts to hazard.

A merchant venturer of daintie meate.
Nashe, Pierce Penilesse, p. 48.

The venturers with the sword were sixty thousand in number, . . . because Mustafa had dispersed a rumour . . . that Famagusta was much more wealthy and rich then the citie of Nicosia was.
Hakluyt's Voyages, II. i. 129.

2†. A prostitute; a strumpet. Webster.—Merchant Venturers†. Same as Merchant Adventurers. See adventurer.

venturesome (ven'tūr-sum), a. [< venture + -some. Cf. adventuresome.] Inclined to venture; venturous; bold; daring; adventurous; intrepid; hazardous.

That bold and venturesome act of his.
Strype, Eccles. Mem., Henry VIII., an. 1546.

But for the chance preservation of the word in Latin, it might seem venturesome to make Spanish explain Umbrian. Amer. Jour. Philol., VI. 244.

venturesomely (ven'tūr-sum-li), adv. In a venturesome or bold or daring manner.

venturesomeness (ven'tūr-sum-nes), n. The property of being venturesome. Jeffrey.

venturine (ven'tūr-in), n. Same as aventurin.

venturous (ven'tūr-us), a. [By apheresis from aventurous, adventurous.] Daring; bold; hardy; fearless; intrepid; adventurous.

I have a venturous fairy that shall seek the squirrel's hoard, and fetch thee new nuts. Shak., M. N. D., iv. 1. 39.

Pray you, demand him why he is so venturous,
To press thus to my chamber, being forbidden.
B. Jonson, Catiline, ii. 1.

venturously (ven'tūr-us-li), adv. In a venturous manner; daringly; fearlessly; boldly; intrepidly.

Captain Standish and Isaac Alderton went venturously, who were welcomed of him after their manner.
Mourt's Journal, quoted in N. Morton's New England's [Memorial, App., p. 355.

venturousness (ven'tūr-us-nes), n. The quality of being venturous; boldness; hardiness; fearlessness; intrepidity. Boyle.

ventusing†, n. Cupping. See ventouse.

vent-wire (vent'wīr), n. In founding, a long steel wire used to make vent-holes in green and dry sand-molds, to provide an escape for the gases evolved in the process of casting. It is made with an eye at one end, and a sharp point at the other.

venue[1]† (ven′ū), n. [Also venew, veney, venny, venie; < ME. venue*, venyw, < OF. venue, a coming, = Sp. venida, arrival, attack in fencing, = It. venuta, arrival, < L. venire, come: see come. Cf. venue[2].] 1. A coming.

Eche of these vyve at her venyw
Brought zyx thousand as har retenyw.
Arthur (ed. Furnivall), l. 307.

2. In old fencing, a hit; attack; bout; a match or bout in cudgel-play; especially, a contest of regulated length, or of a fixed number of thrusts or blows; hence (because the bout was often ended when one thrust was successful), a thrust; a lunge.

Three veneys for a dish of stewed prunes.
Shak., M. W. of W., i. 1. 296.

A quick venue of wit. Shak., L. L. L., v. 1. 62.

And on his head he laies him on such load
With two quick vennies of his knotty Goad.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Captaines.

Y' have given it me,
And yet I feel life for another veney.
Chapman, Revenge of Bussy D'Ambois, v. 1.

I've breath enough . . .
To give your perfumed worship three venues.
Middleton, Massinger, and Rowley, Old Law, iii. 2.

venue[2] (ven′ū), n. [A particular use of venue[1] (< OF. venue, arrival, resort), appar. confused with OF. visne (cf. ML. visnetum, vicinitus), neighborhood, venue, < L. vicinia, neighborhood, vicinage, vicinus, neighboring: see vicine, vicinity.] In law: (a) The place or neighborhood of a crime or cause of action; in modern times, the county or corresponding division within which in consequence the jury must be gathered and the cause tried. (b) The statement, usually at the top or in the margin, of an indictment or declaration of complaint, indicating the county for trial. (c) A similar statement in an affidavit indicating the place where it was taken and the oath was administered.—Change of venue, change of place of trial.—Local venue, a venue in a case where the facts show that the action must be local, as an action to recover real property.—To lay the venue. See lay[1].—Transitory venue, a venue that is changeable or optional because the cause of action is not local.

venula (ven′ū-lą), n.; pl. venulæ (-lē). [L.: see venule.] A small vein; a veinlet or veinule.

venule (ven′ūl), n. [< L. venula, dim. of vena, a vein: see vein.] A small vein; a veinlet; in entom., same as nervule.

venulite (ven′ū-līt), n. [Irreg. < NL. Venus, a genus of bivalves, + -lite: see -lite.] A fossil shell of the genus Venus, or some similar shell. Properly venerite.

venulose (ven′ū-lōs), a. [< venule + -ose.] In bot., having veinlets, as a leaf.

venulous (ven′ū-lus), a. [< venule + -ous.] Full of veinlets; minutely venous.

Venus (vē′nus), n. [= F. Vénus = Sp. Venus = Pg. Venus = It. Venere, < L. Venus (-eris), Venus, orig. the goddess of beauty and love, esp. of sensual love, also applied to sexual intercourse, venery; orig. a personification of venus, love, desire (but appar. used in Latin literature only as an application of the proper name); akin to venerari, worship, revere, venerate (see venerate), from a root seen in Skt. van, win, = Goth. winnan, suffer, = Icel. vinna = OHG. AS. winnan, strive for: see win.] 1. In Rom. myth., the goddess of beauty and love, more especially sensual love. Venus was of little importance as a Roman goddess until, at a comparatively late period, she was identified with the Greek Aphrodite. She is represented as the highest ideal of female beauty, and was naturally a favorite subject with poets and artists, some of her statues being among the noblest remains of classical sculpture. The following are some of the more important of the innumerable surviving antique statues of this goddess. The Venus of Arles, a fine Greek statue found in 1651 in the ancient theater at Arles, and now in the Louvre Museum. The figure is undraped to below the waist. The hands and forearms are modern restorations. The statue probably belonged to the Victrix type (for this and other types, see the phrases). The Venus of Capua, a very noteworthy antique in the Museum of Naples, discovered in the amphitheater at Capua. The figure is undraped to the hips, and is of the Victrix type. It bears a strong resemblance to the Venus of Melos, but is distinctly inferior to that masterpiece. The head is encircled by a stephane. The Venus of Medici, one of the best-known works of ancient sculpture, treasured in the Uffizi Gallery at Florence. The figure is of Parian marble, wholly undraped, the face turned to one side, one of the arms extended with the hand held before the body, and the other arm bent before the breast. It is shown by the dolphin on the base to belong to the type of the Venus Anadyomene. While the pose is not identical with that of the Venus of Cnidus, it is generally held to be a free rendering of that conception. The figure is somewhat under natural size, being about 5 feet 3 inches in height, but is commonly taken as the exemplar of perfect proportions in a woman. It was found in the Villa of Hadrian, at Tivoli, about 1680. The Venus of Melos (by corruption from the native Greek pronunciation, Venus of Milo), one of the most splendid surviving works of ancient art, discovered by a farmer in the island of Melos in 1820, and now the chief treasure of the Louvre Museum. The statue dates from about the middle of the fourth century B. C. It is undraped to the hips;

the arms are broken off; the figure and face are at once graceful and beautiful, and highly imposing. The type is that of the Victrix. The Venus of the Capitol, in the Capitoline Museum at Rome, undraped, and in attitude and motive very similar to the Venus of Medici, though the Capitoline statue displays a more personal element, and comes closer to the living model. Of the modern statues representing Venus, there may be mentioned the Venus Borghese, a celebrated statue by Canova, in the Villa Borghese at Rome. The statue represents the Princess Pauline (Bonaparte) Borghese in the character of Venus Genetrix. The figure is shown reclining, extending the apple in one hand, the head being a close portrait. See Aphrodite.

2. The most brilliant of the planets, being frequently visible to the naked eye by daylight. It is the second from the sun and next within the earth's orbit, performing its sidereal revolution in 224.7008 days; its distance from the sun is 0.723332 that of the earth. The synodical revolution is made in 584 days. Its orbit is the most nearly circular of those of the major planets, the greatest equation of the center being only 47′ 3″. The inclination of the orbit to the ecliptic is 3° 23′.5; and the earth passes through the ascending node on December 7th. The mass of Venus (which is not very closely ascertained) is about $\frac{1}{410000}$ that of the sun, or $\frac{1}{1.4}$ that of the earth. Its diameter is a little smaller than that of our planet, which subtends an angle of 2 × 8″.827 at the sun's center, while Venus at the same distance has a semidiameter of 8″.68 by the mean of the best night measures, or 8″.40 according to the observations at its transit over the sun. Taking the mean of these (which are affected in opposite ways by irradiation), or 8″.54, we find the diameter of Venus about $\frac{23}{24}$ that of the earth. Its volume is about $\frac{9}{10}$, its density about $\frac{7}{8}$, and gravity at its surface about $\frac{8}{9}$ the same quantities for the earth. It receives 1.9 as much light and heat from the sun as we, and the tidal action of the latter is about 5.3 times as great as upon the earth. The period of rotation of Venus is set down in many books as 23 hours and 50 minutes; but recent observations have led some astronomers to the confident conclusion that the true period falls short but a little of 225 days, and is identical with the orbital period. The old figure was deduced chiefly from the observation that a spot appeared nearly in the same place night after night, so that it seemed as if Venus had made one complete revolution; whereas it now appears that there is in one day no sensible motion. Tidal evolution would explain the coincidence of the periods of rotation and revolution. Formerly the atmosphere of Venus was supposed to be much denser than our own; but the later observations of Russell on the luminous ring which surrounds the planet's disk when very near the sun at inferior conjunction indicate that the density must be less. The spectroscope gives rather uncertain evidence of the presence of water-vapor, and the high albedo of the planet suggests a covering of clouds. Unlike Mars, Venus presents (to most observers) no distinct surface-markings, only faint, indefinite spots, which may be simply atmospheric, and certain irregularities upon the terminator, which have been interpreted by some as lofty mountains. Mr. Lowell, however, claims to see distinct markings on the disk, and has mapped and named them. The night side of Venus, which must be intensely cold, shows a faint coppery-red light which is probably of the nature of an intense aurora. No satellite of Venus has ever been seen. Numerous observations of one were reported in the eighteenth century; but all these have been fairly shown to be fixed stars, except one, which was probably an asteroid. The symbol for Venus is ♀, supposed to represent the goddess's mirror.

The most admired example is in the Museo Pio Clementino in the Vatican.—Venus Anadyomene (marine Venus, or Venus of the Sea), Venus represented as born or rising from the foam of the sea. In art the type has marine attributes, as the dolphin, and is represented undraped. The Venus of Medici is an example.—Venus Callipyge or Kallipygos, a type wrongly attributed to Venus, the subject represented being essentially mortal. One of the best-known statues of this type is in the Museum at Naples.—Venus Genetrix, in art, etc., Venus as the goddess of fecundity. The type presents the goddess undraped, partially draped, or clad in a diaphanous Ionic tunic, with one hand raising the drapery toward her face from the shoulder according to the conventional Greek gesture of marriage, and with the other extending an apple.—Venus of Cnidus, the undraped type of Venus created by Praxiteles, and dedicated in the temple in Cnidus, paralleled with the draped type of the same master, that of Cos. According to tradition, the beautiful Phryne was the model for this statue. The most instructive copies accessible are one in the Vatican (as exhibited, partly masked by painted drapery of tin), and one in the Glyptothek at Munich. The Venus of Medici is generally held to be a free copy of this type. It bears a golden-yellow fruit of the size of a nutmeg, resembling a lime.—Venus's hair, a delicate little fern, Adiantum Capillus-Veneris: so called from the blackish, shining capillary branches of the rachis. It has ovate-lanceolate bipinnate fronds, or the upper part simply pinnate, with pinnules and upper pinnæ wedge-shaped or rhomboid, long-stalked, the upper margin rounded, and more or less incised or crenate. It is cosmopolitan in distribution.—Venus's hair-stones, Venus's pencils, fanciful names applied to rock-crystals inclosing slender hair-like or needle-like crystals of hornblende, asbestos, oxid of iron, rutile, oxid of manganese, etc.—Venus's looking-glass, a plant of the genus Specularia, primarily *S. She is a goddess of noble and majestic type, akin to that of Venus Victrix, and approaching the conception of Juno.—Venus Victrix, Venus victorious, or in the character of a goddess of victory. This type appears associated with the war-god Mars, and is illustrated notably on Roman imperial coins. The goddess is represented with arms and other attributes of war.—Venus with the Apple. See Venus Genetrix.—Warty venus, a bivalve mollusk, Venus verrucosa. The valves have concentric ridges opening backward, and toward the sides or ends becoming coarser and forming knots or tubercles (whence the name). These are diversified by fine ribs or furrows radiating from the beaks. The mollusk is common along the European coasts, and chiefly affects rocky bottoms about low-water mark, but is also found on sand-banks. It is extensively used as food, and has been made the object of a special culture in France.

venust† (vē-nust'), a. [< L. venustus, charming, agreeable, < Venus, the goddess of love and beauty: see Venus.] Beautiful; amiable.

As the infancy of Rome was venust, so was its manhood nobly strenuous.
Waterhouse, Com. on Fortescue, p. 187. (Latham.) ver†, n. [< ME. ver, veer, vere, < OF. ver, < L. ver, spring, Gr. ἔαρ, ἦρ, spring. Cf. vernal.] The spring.

Averil, whan clothed is the mede
With new grene, of lusty Veer the prime.
Chaucer, Troilus, i. 157.

veracious (vē-rā'shus), a. [< L. verax (verac-), speaking truly, truthful, < verus, true, real: see very.] 1. Truthful; habitually disposed to speak truth; observant of truth.

The Spirit is most perfectly and absolutely veracious.
Barrow, Sermons, II. xxxiv. (Latham.)

2. Characterized by truth; true; not false: as, a veracious account or narrative.

The young ardent soul that enters on this world with heroic purpose, with veracious insight, . . . will find [it] a very mad one. Carlyle, Sterling, v.

veraciously (vē-rā'shus-li), adv. In a veracious manner; truthfully.

veracity (vē-ras'i-ti), n. [< OF. veracitie, F. véracité = Sp. veracidad = Pg. veracidade = It. veracità, < ML. veracita(t-)s, truthfulness, < L. verax (verac-), truthful: see veracious.] 1. The fact or character of being veracious or true. Specifically—(a) Habitual regard to or observance of truth; truthfulness; truth: as, a man of veracity.

Let veracity be thy virtue, in words, manners, and actions. Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., iii. 20.

Another form of virtue which usually increases with civilisation is veracity, a term which must be regarded as including something more than the simple avoidance of direct falsehood. Lecky, Europ. Morals, I. 143.

(b) Consistency with truth; agreement with actual fact: as, the veracity of the senses.

In narratives, where historical veracity has no place, I cannot discover why there should not be exhibited the most perfect idea of virtue. Johnson, Rambler, No. 4.

That enthusiasm for truth, that fanaticism of veracity, which is a greater possession than much learning; a nobler gift than the power of increasing knowledge.
Huxley, Universities.

2. That which is true; that in which truth inheres; also, abstract truth.—Principle of veracity. (a) The proposition that man has a natural inclination or propensity toward speaking the truth. (b) The proposition that God's veracity requires us to accept without doubt a given wide-spread belief. This was urged by the English Platonists and others. (c) The proposition that innate beliefs must be accepted on account of the veracity of consciousness.—Veracity of consciousness, the conformity of natural beliefs to the truth.

veranda (vē-ran'dä), n. [Also verandah, formerly also varanda, voranda, feranda, feerandah; cf. F. véranda = Sw. Dan. veranda (< E.); < Hind. varandā, Beng. bārāndā, Malay baranda, late Skt. varanda, a veranda, portico; supposed by some to be derived from Pers. barāmadah, a porch, terrace, balcony (< barāmadan, ascend, < bar, up, + āmadan, come, arrive), but perhaps from the similar OPg. and OSp. terms (which are found too early to be derived from the Hind. word), namely OPg. varanda (1498), OSp. varanda (1505), a balcony, railing (Yule), "rails to leane the brest on" (Percival; so Minsheu), < vara, a rod, < L. vara, a rod, stick: see vare[1].] An open portico, or a light gallery attached to the exterior of a building, with a roof supported on pillars, and a balustrade or railing, and sometimes partly inclosed in front with latticework. By a popular but erroneous usage, often called piazza in the United States.

veratralbine (ver-ā-tral'bin), n. [< Veratr(um) + alb(um) + -ine[2].] An alkaloid obtained from Veratrum album.

veratrate (vē-rā'trāt), n. [< veratr(ic) + -ate[1].] In chem., a salt of veratric acid.

Veratreæ (vē-rā'trē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Salisbury, 1812), < Veratrum + -eæ.] A tribe of melanthiaceous, sometimes bulbous, plants, characterized by a tall leafy stem, or with most of the leaves radical, and by panicled or racemed and chiefly polygamous flowers with confluent and finally orbicular-peltate anther-cells. The 32 species are classed in 6 genera, of which Schœnocaulon, Chrosperma, Stenanthium, and Melanthium are confined to America; the others, Zigadenus and Veratrum (the type), occur also in the north of the old world. They bear purple, greenish, or white flowers.

veratric (vē-rā'trik), a. [< Veratr(um) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to veratrine or the genus Veratrum.—Veratric acid, $C_9H_{10}O_4$, the acid with which veratrine exists combined in Schœnocaulon officinale. It crystallizes in short white transparent prisms, which are soluble in water and alcohol, and forms crystallizable salts with the alkalis, which are called veratrates. It has sometimes been called cevadic, cevadillic, or sabadillic acid.

veratrine (vē-rā'trin), n. [< Veratr(um) + -ine[2].] An alkaloid, or a mixture of alkaloids, derived from several species of Veratrum and from cevadilla. It is an exceedingly poisonous substance, used chiefly in medicine, in the form of ointment, as an application for the relief of neuralgia.—Oleate of veratrine. See oleate.

veratrize (vē-rā'trīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. veratrized, ppr. veratrizing. [< veratr(ine) + -ize.] To give veratrine to in sufficient dose to produce its physiological effects; poison with veratrine: a procedure employed sometimes in physiological experiments upon animals.

veratroidine (ver-ā-troi'din), n. [< Veratr(um) + -oid + -ine[2].] An amorphous alkaloid of doubtful identity obtained from Veratrum lobelianum.

Veratrum (vē-rā'trum), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700; earlier by Lobel, 1576), < L. veratrum, hellebore.] A genus of plants of the family Melanthiaceæ. It is characterized by stems clad with numerous broad plicate leaves contracted into a sheathing base. There are about 10 species, four of which are natives of Europe and Siberia, the others of North America. They are tall, erect, robust perennials, growing from a thick rootstock with somewhat fleshy fascicled root-fibers. The flowers are purplish, green, or white, very abundant, in a terminal panicle, and followed by erect or reflexed capsules separated into three carpels. The species are known in general as white hellebore, especially V. album and V. nigrum of Europe, and V. viride of North America, species respectively with whitish, blackish, and green flowers; their rootstocks are powerfully emetic and cathartic, and are collected in quantities for medicinal use —V. album in Germany, and V. viride in North Carolina. Both are very acrid, occasioning excessive irritation of the digestive tract. V. album has also been known as lingwort, and, from its effect as an errhine, as sneezewort; it is chiefly subalpine, and occurs from Europe to Japan; its roots furnish the alkaloids veratrine, jervine, rubijervine, and others, also cevadic acid. A poisonous gray powder prepared from it is used to destroy caterpillars; the fresh leaves are, however, freely eaten by slugs and snails. V. viride, the principal American species, known also as Indian poke, and locally as itchweed, bugbane, and earth-gall, widely distributed in and near mountain regions from Georgia into Canada and from Oregon to Sitka, is a coarse herb from 3 to 7 feet high, with numerous conspicuously ribbed and plaited ample leaves, which are ovate, pointed, and clasping. The whole plant is a nearly uniform deep green, including the conspicuous flowers, which form a pyramidal inflorescence sometimes over a foot long. Its thick, fleshy rootstock is sharp and bitter in taste, was used as an emetic by the Indians, and is also now in local use as a cardiac, and in fevers as a sedative. Many other species have conspicuous and peculiar flowers: they are green in V. parviflorum, greenish-purple in V. Woodii (the Indiana pokeweed), green and white in V. Californicum, dark-brown with the outside hoary in V. intermedium of Florida; in V. fimbriatum, of the Mendocino plains, they are fringed and spotted.

Flowering Plant of American White Hellebore, or Indian Poke (Veratrum viride).
a, male flower; b, perfect flower; c, capsule.

veray†. A Middle English form of very.

verb (vėrb), n. [< F. verbe = Sp. Pg. It. verbo, < L. verbum, a word, language, a verb, = E. word, q. v.] 1†. A word; a vocable.

That so it might appear, that the assistance of the Spirit, promised to the church, was not a vain thing, or a mere verb. South, Sermons, IX. v.

2. In gram., a word that asserts or declares; that part of speech of which the office is predication, and which, either alone or with various modifiers or adjuncts, combines with a subject to make a sentence. Predication is the essential function of a verb, and this function is all that makes a verb; that distinctions of tense and mode and person should be involved in a verb-form, as is the case in the languages of our family and in some other languages, is unessential, and those distinctions may be and are sometimes wanting. Infinitives and participles are not verbs, but only verbal nouns and adjectives, sharing in the constructions that belong to a verb. In languages like ours, the most important classification of verbs is into transitive and intransitive; and even that is not definite, nor founded on any essential distinction. Abbreviated v.—Auxiliary, contract, deponent verb. See the adjectives.—Irregular verb, a verb not regular: in English including not only cases like sing, sang, sung (usually called strong verbs), but such as lead, led; put, put; work, wrought.—Liquid, personal, reflexive verb. See the adjectives.—Regular verb, a verb inflected after the most usual model: in English, by addition of -ed or -d in preterit and past participle: as, seat, seated; pile, piled.—Strong, weak verb. See the adjectives.

verbal (vėr'bal), a. and n. [< F. verbal = Sp. Pg. verbal = It. verbale, < LL. verbalis, consisting of words, < L. verbum, a word, verb: see verb.] I. a. 1. Of, pertaining to, or consisting in words.

Cicero the orator complained of Socrates and his school that he was the first that separated philosophy and rhetoric; whereupon rhetoric became an empty and verbal art. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

It is obvious enough that, unless the lower animals have some substitute for verbal symbols, as yet undiscovered by us, they are incapable of general ideas and of any mental processes involving these.
J. Sully, Sensation and Intuition, p. 16.

The future progress of our speech, it may be hoped, will bring back to us many a verbal Rip Van Winkle.
G. P. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., xii.

2. Relating to or concerned with words only.

If slight and verbal differences in copies be a good argument against the genuineness of a writing, we have no genuine writing of any ancient author at this day.
Abp. Sharp, Works, II. iii.

Of those scholars who have disdained to confine themselves to verbal criticism few have been successful.
Macaulay, Athenian Orators.

A verbal dispute. Whately.

3. Expressed in spoken words; spoken; not written; oral: as, a verbal contract; verbal testimony.

Made she no verbal question? Shak., Lear, iv. 3. 26.

4. Minutely exact in words; attending to words only; insistent about words.

I am much sorry, Sir,

Make verbal repetition of her moans.
Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 831.

6. Of or pertaining to a verb; derived from a verb and sharing in its senses and constructions: as, a verbal noun.

A person is the special difference of a verbal number.
B. Jonson, English Grammar, i. 16.

In its attributive use, finally, the participle throws off its verbal power and approximates an adjective, as in Vernante silva caremus. Amer. Jour. Philol., X. 317.

Verbal amnesia, the loss of all knowledge of the relation between words and things; complete aphasia.—Verbal contract. See contract.—Verbal definition, a definition intended to state the precise meaning of a word or phrase according to usage, but not to state the essential characters of a form according to the nature of things.—Verbal degradation. See degradation, 1 (a).—Verbal inspiration. See inspiration, 3.—Verbal note, in diplomacy, an unsigned memorandum or note when an affair has continued for a long time without any reply. It is designed to show that the matter is not urgent, but that at the same time it has not been overlooked. Encyc. Dict.—Verbal noun. See II.=Syn. 1-5. Verbal, Oral, Literal. Verbal is much used for oral: as, a verbal message; and sometimes for literal: as, a verbal translation. It is an old and proper rule of rhetoric (Campbell, bk. 2, ch. ii., § 1, canon 1) that, when of two words or phrases one is susceptible of two significations and the other of only one, the latter, for the sake of avoiding obscurity, should be preferred; by this rule we should say an oral message, oral tradition, a literal translation. Verbal nicety or criticism is nicety or criticism about words.

II. n. In gram., a noun derived from a verb and sharing in its senses and constructions; a verbal noun.

verbalism (vėr'bal-izm), n. [< verbal + -ism.] Something expressed orally; a verbal remark or expression.

verbalist (vėr'bal-ist), n. [< verbal + -ist.] One who deals in words merely; one skilled in words; a literal adherent to or a minute critic of words; a literalist; a verbarian.

verbality (vėr-bal'i-ti), n. [< verbal + -ity.] The state or quality of being verbal; bare literal expression. Sir T. Browne.

verbalization (vėr''bal-i-zā'shon), n. [< verbalize + -ation.] The act of verbalizing, or the state of being verbalized. Also spelled verbalisation.

The verbalization, if I may so express it, of a noun is now a difficult matter, and we shrink from the employment even of well-authorized old nominal verbs.
G. P. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., xiv.

verbalize (vėr'bal-īz), v.; pret. and pp. verbalized, ppr. verbalizing. [= F. verbaliser; as verbal + -ize.] I. trans. To convert into a verb. G. P. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., viii.

II. intrans. To use many words; be verbose or diffuse.

Also spelled verbalise.

verbally (vėr'bal-i), adv. In a verbal manner. (a) In words spoken; by words uttered; orally.

Verbally to deny it. South.

(b) Word for word: as, to translate verbally. (c) Like a verb; as or in the manner of a verb.

The verbally used [Scythian] forms are rather but one step removed from nouns used predicatively, with subjective or possessive pronominal elements appended.
Whitney, Life and Growth of Lang., p. 233.

verbarian (vėr-bā'ri-an), n. and a. [< L. verbum, word, + -arian.] I. n. A word-coiner; a verbalist.

In "The Doctor" Southey gives himself free scope as a verbarian, much after the way of Rabelais, Thomas Nash, Taylor the Water-poet, or Feltham.
F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 21, note 2.

II. a. Of or pertaining to words; verbal.

verbarium (vėr-bā'ri-um), n. [NL., < L. verbum, word: see verb.] A game played with the letters of the alphabet. (a) A game in which the player strives to make out a word when all the letters that compose it are given to him indiscriminately. (b) A game in which the player tries to form from the letters that compose a long word as many other words as possible.

Verbasceæ (vėr-bas'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bartling, 1830), < Verbascum + -eæ.] A tribe of dicotyledonous sympetalous plants, of the family Scrophulariaceæ. It is characterized by flowers in terminal spikes or racemes, having a wheel-shaped or rarely concave corolla with five broad lobes, of which the two upper are exterior. It includes 6 genera, of which Verbascum is the type.

Verbascum (vėr-bas'kum), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700; earlier in Brunfels, 1530), < L. verbascum, mullen.] A genus of plants, type of the tribe Verbasceæ in the family Scrophulariaceæ. It is distinguished from the other genera of its tribe by its five perfect stamens. About 200 species have been described, many of them hybrids or varieties. They are natives of Europe, North Africa, and western and central Asia. They are herbs, usually biennial, more or less clad in floccose wool, commonly tall and erect, rarely low and branching or spiny. The soft alternate leaves vary from entire to pinnatifid. The flowers are yellow, purplish, red, or rarely white, solitary or clustered in the axils of bracts, and disposed in terminal spikes or racemes, less often in panicles. The fruit is a two-valved capsule, globular, egg-shaped, or flattened. The stem-leaves are sessile and often decurrent, the radical leaves (frequently very large) coarse and conspicuous. The leaves of V. Thapsus, the common mullen, are mucilaginous and somewhat bitter, are used as emollient applications to tumors, and are the source of several popular remedies. (See mullen, with cut.) Five species are naturalized in the United States; 6 are natives of Great Britain, and about 50 others of continental Europe. V. Lychnitis and V. pulverulentum, the white mullens of England and other parts of Europe, produce stiff branching panicles of yellow flowers with white-bearded filaments; they are covered with a white powdery down which readily rubs off. About a dozen yellow-flowered species are thought worthy of cultivation for ornament, among which V. Chaixi is remarkable for its tall stem, 10 feet high, with large green leaves, and enormous branching panicles of yellow flowers with purplish filaments. V. phœniceum, from southern Europe, is peculiar in its large spike of showy violet flowers.

verbatim (vėr-bā'tim), adv. [< ML. verbatim, word for word, < L. verbum, word: see verb.] 1. Word for word; in exactly the same words: sometimes extended into the phrase verbatim, literatim, et punctatim, word for word, letter for letter, and point for point, as in the most exact transcription, in bibliography, etc.

Antonius, in a letter which is recited verbatim in one of Cicero's Philippics, called him [Decimus Brutus] "venefica," witch — as if he had enchanted Cæsar.
Bacon, Friendship (ed. 1887).

And this I have set downe almost verbatim from the report of the aforesaid Ambrose Earle of Warwicke that now is, who was present at that action, and had his horse also wounded under him with two or three arrowes.
Sir J. Smyth, in Ellis's Lit. Letters, p. 56.

2†. By word of mouth; orally; verbally.

Think not, although in writing I preferr'd
The manner of thy vile outrageous crimes,
That therefore I have forged, or am not able Verbatim to rehearse the method of my pen.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., iii. 1. 13.

Verbena (vėr-bē'nä), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700; earlier in Brunfels, 1530), < L. verbena, usu. in pl. verbenæ, foliage, leaves, branches used in sacred rites, also plants used as cooling remedies: see vervain.] 1. A genus of plants, type of the family Verbenaceæ and tribe Verbeneæ. It is characterized by flowers sessile in an elongated or flattened spike, and by a dry fruit with four one-seeded nutlets or cells included within an unchanged tubular calyx. There are about 100 species, mostly American. One, V. officinalis, is widely dispersed over warm and temperate parts of the Old World; another, V. Bonariensis, is naturalized in Africa and Asia; one only, V. supina, is peculiar to the Old World, and occurs in the Mediterranean region from the Canary Islands to western Asia; another, V. macrostachya, is confined to Australia. They are diffuse decumbent or erect summer-flowering herbs (shrubby in a few South American species), commonly villous with unbranched hairs. Their leaves are usually opposite, and incised or dissected; their flowers are sessile, and solitary in the axils of the narrow bracts of a terminal spike. The spikes are compact and thick, or long and slender, sometimes corymbed or panicled. About 23 species are found in the United States, mostly weedy and small-flowered; 8 of these occur within the northeastern States, of which the principal are V. hastata, the blue, and V. urticæfolia, the white vervain, tall plants with long panicled or clustered spikes. For V. officinalis, the chief introduced species, see vervain, herb of the cross (under herb), pigeon's-grass, simpler's-joy, and cut under laciniate. Four southwestern species produce large showy pink or purplish flower-clusters, which elongate into spikes in fruit; among these V. bipinnatifida and V. Canadensis are sometimes cultivated. The latter is a creeping and spreading perennial with incised leaves, parent of many garden hybrids; it occurs in open places from Florida to Illinois, Arkansas, and Mexico, in nature with rose-colored, purple, or lilac flowers. The numerous cultivated verbenas, very popular in the United States from their brilliant and continuous bloom and from their growth in masses, are largely derived from the South American species V. chamædrifolia, V. phlogiflora, V. teucrioides, and V. erinoides, in nature respectively scarlet, rose-colored, white, and lilac-purple. In cultivation they include all colors except yellow and pure blue; many are striped; and the best have a distinct eye, or bright central spot. Several species are also very fragrant, especially V. teucrioides. V. venosa is more often cultivated in England.

Verbena Canadensis.

2. [l. c.] A plant of this genus.—Lemon-scented verbena. Same as lemon-verbena.

Verbenaceæ (vėr-bē-nā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Jussieu, 1804), < Verbena + -aceæ.] A family of dicotyledonous sympetalous plants, of the order Polemoniales. It is characterized by an inferior radicle, usually opposite leaves, and irregular bisexual flowers, and is particularly distinguished from the nearly related family Menthaceæ by an entire ovary and a fruit with either two or four nutlets. It includes about 1200 species, belonging to 72 genera, classed in 7 subfamilies, of which the types are: Stilbe, Verbena, Chloanthes, Vitex, Barbula, Symphorema, and Avicennia. They are either herbs, shrubs, or trees. Their leaves are usually opposite or whorled, entire, toothed, or incised, and without stipules. The inflorescence is a spike, raceme, panicle, or cyme, either simple or compound. The corolla is usually small, commonly with a distinct tube which is often incurved, five or frequently four imbricate flat-spreading lobes, and four didynamous stamens; some genera produce only two stamens or a two-lipped corolla with one or more lobes enlarged or erect. The ovary contains at first one, soon two, and at length commonly four cells, each cell usually with one ovule; in fruit it becomes more or less drupaceous, with a juicy, fleshy, or dry exocarp, and an indurated endocarp, which is indehiscent, or breaks into two or four nutlets, or rarely more. They are rare in the north temperate zone, common in the tropics and in temperate parts of South America. They are herbaceous in colder regions, becoming shrubby in the tropics, or even very large trees, as the teak. The fruit is sometimes edible, as in species of Lantana and Premna, but is more often acrid. Their properties are sometimes aromatic. Many are of medicinal repute, as species of Callicarpa, Congea, and Clerodendrum. (See Stachytarpheta and Vitex.) Many genera are cultivated for ornament, as Verbena, Lantana, and Clerodendrum, or for the colored fruit, as Callicarpa. Thirteen genera are native within the United States.

verbenaceous (vėr-bē-nā'shius), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Verbenaceæ.

verbena-oil (vėr-bē'nä-oil), n. Same as Indian melissa-oil (which see, under melissa-oil).

verbenate† (vėr'bē-nāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. verbenated, ppr. verbenating. [< L. verbenatus, crowned with a garland of sacred boughs, < verbenæ, sacred boughs: see Verbena.] To strew or sanctify with sacred boughs, according to a custom of the ancients.

verbene (vėr'bēn), n. [< NL. Verbena, q. v.] A plant of the family Verbenaceæ. Lindley.

Verbeneæ (vėr-bē'nē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Reichenbach, 1828), < Verbena + -eæ.] A tribe of plants, of the family Verbenaceæ. It includes 25 genera, of which Verbena is the type. This classification is retained in Engler's Syllabus, but in the compendium of his system by Dalle Torre and Harms it is made a subfamily (Verbenoideæ).

verberate† (vėr'bėr-āt), v. t. [< L. verberatus, pp. of verberare (> It. verberare = Pg. Sp. verberar), lash, scourge, whip, beat, < verber, a whip, rod. Cf. reverberate.] To beat; strike.

Bub. I have a great desire to be taught some of your . . . brave words. . . .
Gorg. You shall be verberated, and reverberated.
Shirley, Love Tricks, iii. 5.

Bosom-quarrels that verberate and wound his soul.
Abp. Sancroft, Modern Policies, § 1.

verberation (vėr-bė-rā'shon), n. [= F. verbération = Sp. verberación = Pg. verberação, < L. verberatio(n-), a beating, chastisement, < verberare, lash, whip, beat: see verberate.] 1. The act of beating or striking; a percussion.

Riding or walking against great winds is a great exercise, the effects of which are redness and inflammation; all the effects of a soft press or verberation.
Arbuthnot, On Air.

Distinguishing verberation, which was accompanied with pain, from pulsation, which was attended with none.
Blackstone, Com., III. viii.

2. The impulse of a body which causes sound.

Verbesina (vėr-bē-sī'nä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), altered from Verbena on account of a resemblance in the leaves of the original species.] A genus of composite plants, of the tribe Heliantheæ, type of the subtribe Verbesineæ. It is characterized by small or middle-sized corymbose flower-heads (sometimes large, solitary, and long-peduncled) with the rays fertile or rarely lacking, and by achenes laterally compressed, distinctly two-winged, sometimes ciliate, and usually awned by a pappus of two rigid or slender bristles. There are about 70 species, natives of warm parts of America, occurring from the Argentine Republic to Mexico, and with 8 species in the southern United States, one yellow-flowered species, V. occidentalis, and perhaps also the white-flowered V. Virginica, extending north into Pennsylvania. A few species are naturalized in the old world. They are herbs or sometimes shrubby, a few becoming small trees of about 20 feet in height, and are known as crown-beard. Their leaves are usually toothed and opposite, and the petioles decurrent. The flower-heads are usually yellow; after blossoming, they are apt to become ovoid or globose by the elevation of a conical receptacle. Ximenesia encelioides of Texas, Arizona, and Mexico, referred to this genus by some authors, now widely dispersed through warm regions, is cultivated for its yellow flowers.

verbiage (vėr'bi-āj), n. [< F. verbiage, wordiness, < L. verbum, word: see verb.] The use of many words without necessity; superabundance of words; wordiness; verbosity.

He evinced a constitutional determination to verbiage unsurpassed, . . . and only those who knew him could possibly appreciate his affluence of rigmarole.
J. T. Fields, Underbrush, p. 98.

=Syn. Verbosity, etc. See pleonasm.

verbicide[1] (vėr'bi-sīd), n. [< L. verbum, a word, + -cidium, a killing, < cædere, kill.] The killing of a word, in a figurative sense; perversion of a word from its proper meaning, as in punning. [Rare and humorous.]

Homicide and verbicide — that is, violent treatment of a word with fatal results to its legitimate meaning, which is its life — are alike forbidden.
O. W. Holmes, Autocrat, i.

verbicide[2] (vėr'bi-sīd), n. [< L. verbum, a word, + -cida, a killer, < cædere, kill.] One who kills a word or words. [Rare and humorous.]

These clownish verbicides have carried their antics to the point of disgust.
M. C. Tyler, The Independent (New York), May 2, 1867.

verbiculture (vėr'bi-kul-tūr), n. [< L. verbum, a word, + cultura, cultivation: see culture.] The cultivation or production of words. [Rare.]

Our fathers . . . brought forth fruits which would not have shamed the most deliberate verbiculture.
F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 289.

verbification (vėr″bi-fi-kā'shon), n. [< LL. verbificatio(n-), a talking, < L. verbum, a word, + facere, do, make.] The act or process of verbifying. Trans. Amer. Philol. Ass., XV. 32, App. [Rare.]

verbify (vėr'bi-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. verbified, ppr. verbifying. [< verb + -i-fy.] To make into a verb; use as a verb; verbalize.

Nouns become verbified by the appending of inflectional affixes, generally suffixes, and are inflected like verbs.
Trans. Amer. Philol. Ass., XV. 27, App.

verbigeration (vėr″bi-jē-rā'shon), n. [< LL. verbigere, talk, chat, dispute, < L. verbum, a word, + gerere, bear about, carry.] In pathol., the continual utterance of certain words or phrases, repeated at short intervals, without any reference to their meaning.

verbose (vėr-bōs'), a. [= F. verbeux = Sp. Pg. It. verboso, < L. verbosus, full of words, prolix, wordy, < verbum, word: see verb.] Abounding in words; using or containing more words than are necessary; prolix; tedious by multiplicity of words; wordy: as, a verbose speaker; a verbose argument.

They ought to be brief, and not too verbose in their way of speaking.
Ayliffe, Parergon.

=Syn. Wordy, diffuse. See pleonasm.

verbosely (vėr-bōs'li), adv. In a verbose manner; wordily; prolixly.

I hate long arguments verbosely spun.
Cowper, Epistle to J. Hill.

verboseness (vėr-bōs'nes), n. Verbosity.

verbosity (vėr-bos'i-ti), n. [< F. verbosité = Sp. verbosidad = Pg. verbosidade = It. verbosità, <

LL. verbosita(t-)s, wordiness, < L. verbosus, wordy: see verbose.] The state or character of being verbose; employment of a superabundance of words; the use of more words than are necessary; wordiness; prolixity: said either of a speaker or writer, or of what is said or written.

He draweth out the thread of his verbosity finer than the staple of his argument. Shak., L. L. L., v. 1. 18.

=Syn. Verbiage, etc. See pleonasm.

verd† (vėrd), n. [Also (in def. 2) vert; < OF. verd, vert, F. vert = Sp. Pg. It. verde, green, greenness, verdure, < L. viride, green, greenness, verdure, pl. viridia, green plants, herbs, or trees, neut. of viridis (> It. Sp. Pg. verde = OF. verd, vert), green, < virere, be green, be fresh or vigorous, bloom. From the L. viridis are also ult. E. vert[1] (in part identical with verd), verdant, verderer, verdure, verdugo, virid, farthingale, etc., and the first element of verdigris, verditer, verjuice, etc.] 1. Green; green color; greenness.

Then is there an old kinde of Rithme called Vish layes, deriued (as I haue redde) of this worde Verd whiche betokeneth Greene, and Laye which betokeneth a Song, as if you would say greene Songes.
Gascoigne, Notes on Eng. Verse, § 14 (Steele Glas, etc., [ed. Arber).

2. The green trees and underwood of a forest: same as vert.

verdancy (vėr'dan-si), n. [< verdan(t) + -cy.] 1. The state or quality of being verdant; greenness. Hence — 2. Rawness; inexperience; liability to be deceived: as, the verdancy of youth.

verdant (vėr'dant), a. [< OF. verdant (?), F. verdoyant, becoming green, < L. viridan(t-)s, ppr. of viridare, grow green, make green, < viridis, green, < virere, be green: see verd.] 1. Green; fresh; covered with growing plants or grass: as, verdant fields; a verdant lawn.

The verdant gras my couch did goodly dight.
Spenser, F. Q., I. ix. 13.

2. Green in knowledge; simple by reason of inexperience; inexperienced; unsophisticated; raw; green.

verd-antique (vėrd-an-tēk'), n. [< OF. verd antique, F. vert antique, 'ancient green,' = It. verde antico, see vert and antique.] An ornamental stone which has long been used and highly prized, having been well known to the ancient Romans. It consists of serpentine, forming a kind of breccia, mingled or interveined with a much lighter material, usually calcite, but sometimes magnesite or steatite, and sometimes a lighter-colored serpentine, the whole forming, when polished, an extremely beautiful material for constructive purposes or for interior decoration. Serpentines of various kinds and of different shades of color were obtained from Italian quarries, and also from those of Greece and Egypt, and were called by various names, according to the region from which they came: thus, verde di Prato, verde di Genova, verde di Pegli, etc. The verde di Prato, quarried near Florence, has been extensively used in various important buildings in that city, as in the cathedral and the campanile of Giotto, as well as in the church of Sta. Maria Novella. Serpentine of the verd-antique type has also been quarried and used in various other regions, as in Cornwall; in the counties of Galway, Donegal, and Sligo in Ireland; in Banffshire, Scotland; and in Vermont and Connecticut in the United States. The objections to its use in outdoor construction are that, as a general rule, it does not stand the weather well, and that it is not easily obtained in large blocks sufficiently free from flaws to justify their use. Also called ophicalcite.

The hills of Antioch are part of them of a crumbling stone, like verd antique.
Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 193.

verdantly (vėr'dant-li), adv. In a verdant manner. (a) Freshly; flourishingly. (b) After the manner of a person green or simple through inexperience. [Colloq.]

verdantness (vėr'dant-nes), n. The character or state of being verdant, in any sense.

verdea (ver-dā'ä), n. [< It. verdea (F. verdée), name of a variety of grape and of wine made from it, < verde, green: see verd, vert[1].] 1. A white grape from which wine is made in Italy. — 2. A wine made from this grape, or in part from it, produced in the neighborhood of Arcetri, near Florence.

verde antico. Same as verd-antique.

verde di Corsica. See gabbro.

verdée (ver-dā'), a. In her., same as verdoy.

verderer† (vėr'dėr), n. Same as verdure, 3.

verderer, verderor (vėr'dėr-ėr, -or), n. [Formerly also verdour (the second -er being superfluous, as in poulterer, fruiterer, etc.), < OF. verdier, < ML. viridarius, one in charge of the trees and underwood of the forest, < LL. viride, greenness, pl. green plants: see verd[1], vert.] In Eng. forest law, a judicial officer in the royal forests, whose peculiar charge was to take care of the vert — that is, the trees and underwood of the forest — and to keep the assizes, as well as to view, receive, and enroll attachments and presentments of all manner of trespasses.

They [the freeholders] were the men who served on juries, who chose the coroner and the verderer.
Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 480.

★verdict (vėr'dikt), n. [Formerly also verdit; < ME. verdit, verdite, verdoit, voirdit, < OF. verdit, verdict, < ML. veredictum, a verdict, lit. 'a true saying or report'; orig. two words, vere dictum: vere, truly; dictum, neut. of dictus, pp. of dicere, say: see diction.] 1. In law, the answer of a jury given to the court concerning any matter of fact in any cause, civil or criminal, committed to their trial and examination. In criminal causes the usual verdict is "guilty" or "not guilty"; in Scotland it may be "not proven." In civil causes it is a verdict for the plaintiff or for the defendant, according to the fact. These are called general verdicts. In some civil causes, when there is a doubt as to how the law ought to be applied to the facts, a special verdict is given finding and stating specific facts, and leaving the court to draw the proper conclusion. See jury.

He tolde me that he seide to the jurores whiche have sealed her verdite: "Seris, I wot well this verdite after my makyng is not effectuel in lawe, and therefore may happe it shall be makid newe at London." Paston Letters, I. 54.

My soul, . . . thy doubt-depending cause
Can ne'er expect one verdict 'twixt two laws.
Quarles, Emblems, iv. Epig. 1.

2. Decision; judgment; opinion pronounced: as, the verdict of the public.

Bad him seye his verdit as him leste.
Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 787.

Nor caring how slightly they put off the verdit of holy Text unsalv'd. Milton, Prelatical Episcopacy.

We will review the deeds of our fathers, and pass that just verdict on them we expect from posterity on our own.
Emerson, Hist. Discourse at Concord.

Open verdict, a verdict upon an inquest which finds that a crime has been committed, but does not specify the criminal, or which finds that a sudden or violent death has occurred, but does not find the cause proved. — Partial verdict. See partial. — Privy verdict. See privy. — Sealed verdict, a verdict reduced to writing and sealed up for delivery to the court: a method sometimes allowed, to avoid detaining the jury, after they have reached an agreement, until the next session of the court. — Special verdict, a verdict in which the jury find the facts and state them as proved, but leave the conclusion to be drawn from the facts to be determined by the court according as the law applicable thereto may require.

=Syn. 1. Decree, Judgment, etc. See decision.

verdigris (vėr'di-grēs), n. [Formerly also verdigrease (prob. often associated with E. grease, as also with ambergris); < ME. verdegrese, verdegrece, verdegrees, verdgrese, verte grece, verte grez, < OF. verd de gris, "verdigrease, a Spanish greene" (Cotgrave), also vert de gris, F. vert-de-gris (the ME. form verte grece glossed by ML. viride Grecum, lit. 'Greek green'): OF. verd, vert (< ML. viride), green; de, of; Gris, Greeks, pl. of Gri, < L. Græcus, Greek: see Greek and Grew[3]. For the name 'Greek green,' cf. MHG. grüenspan, spangrüen, G. grünspan, Sw. spanskgröna, spanskgrönt, Dan. spanskgrönt, D. spaansch-groen, verdigris, < ML. viride Hispanum (also viride Hispanicum), 'Spanish green.' The F. vert de gris has been erroneously explained as 'green of gray' (gris, gray: see grise[4]); the form verte grez as possibly for vert aigret, green produced by acid (vinegar: see eager[1] and vinegar); also as 'green grit' (grez, grit: see grit[2]); or as substituted for another term for verdigris, namely OF. verderis, < ML. viride æris, verdigris, lit. 'green of copper' (æris, gen. of æs, copper or bronze). Cf. OF. verdet, verdigris, dim. of verd, green.] A substance obtained by exposing plates of copper to the air in contact with acetic acid, and much used as a pigment, as a mordant in dyeing wool black, in calico-printing, and in gilding, in several processes in the chemical arts, and in medicine. Verdigris, like all the compounds into which copper enters, is poisonous; and it is very apt to form on the surface of copper utensils, owing to the action of vegetable juices. It is, chemically, a crystalline salt known as the basic acetate of copper. It ranges in hue from green to greenish-blue, according to the proportions of acetic acid and copper contained. As a pigment it is fairly permanent, but has little body, and is generally used only as a glazing color.

Bole armoniak, verdegrees, boras.
Chaucer, Prol. to Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 237.

Distilled verdigris, a neutral acetate of copper, obtained by dissolving common verdigris in hot acetic acid, and allowing the salt to crystallize out of the cooled solution. It forms dark-green crystals.

verdigris (vėr'di-grēs), v. t. [< verdigris, n.] To cause to be coated with verdigris; cover or ★coat with verdigris. Hawthorne.

verdigris-green (vėr'di-grēs-grēn), n. A bright, very bluish green.

verdin (vėr'din), n. [< F. verdin, yellowhammer (= Sp. verdino, bright-green), < verd, vert, green: see verd.] The gold tit, or yellow-headed titmouse, Auriparus flaviceps, inhabiting parts of Arizona, California, and southward. It is 4½ inches long, of a grayish color with bright-yellow head. See tit[2] and titmouse.

verdingale†, verdingal†, n. Same as farthingale.

verdit†, verdite†, n. Obsolete forms of verdict.

verditer (vėr'di-tėr), n. [< OF. verd de terre, earth-green: verd, green; de, of; terre, earth.] A name applied to two pigments, one green, the other blue, prepared by decomposing copper nitrate with chalk or quicklime. See green[1] and blue.

verditure†, n. An erroneous form of verditer. Peacham.

verdjuice†, n. An old spelling of verjuice.

verdoy (vėr'doi), a. [< OF. verdoyer, become green, put out leaves, < verd, green: see verd.] In her., charged with leaves, branches, or other vegetable forms: especially noting a border. Also verdée.

verdun (vėr-dun'), n. [< Verdun, a town in France.] A long straight sword with a narrow blade, used in the sixteenth century: a variety of the rapier of that period, carried rather in civil life than in war. The blade was 3 feet 6 inches or more in length. This weapon was considered as especially suitable for the duel.

verdure (vėr'dūr), n. [< ME. verdure, < OF. verdure, F. verdure (= Sp. Pg. It. verdura), < verd, vert, < L. viridis, green: see verd.] 1. Greenness; specifically, the fresh green of vegetation; also, green vegetation itself: as, the verdure of spring.

The iconostase or screen is a high wall of burnished vermeil, with five superposed rows of figures framed in richly ornamented cases of embossed metal.
Harper's Mag., LXXIX. 334.

3. In gilding, a liquid composed of arnotto, gamboge, vermilion, dragon's-blood, salt of tartar, and saffron, boiled in water and applied to a surface that is to be gilded, to give luster to the gold. E. H. Knight.—4. A crimson-red garnet inclining slightly to orange: a jewelers' name.

vermeiledt, a. [Also vermiled; < vermeil + *-ed*2.] Gilded.

The presses painted and vermiled with gold.
Ph. de Commines, D d 3.

It is all of square marble, and all the front vermiled with golde. Ibid. (Nares.) vermelett, n. [< OF. vermeillet, somewhat red, dim. of vermeil, red: see vermeil.] Vermilion.

O bright Regina, who made the so faire?
Who made thy colour vermelet and white?
Court of Love, l. 142.

vermeologist (vėr-mē-ol′ō-jist), n. [< vermeolog-y + -ist.] One who is versed in vermeology; a helminthologist.

vermeology (vėr-mē-ol′ō-ji), n. [Irreg. < L. vermis, a worm (> NL. Vermes, the worms), + Gr. -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The knowledge or description of worms; that branch of zoölogy which treats of the Vermes; helminthology.

Vermes (vėr′mēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. vermis, a worm, = E. worm.] 1. Worms: formerly including animals resembling the common earthworm, but having no exact classificatory sense, and hence no standing in zoölogy.—2†. The sixth and last division of animals in the Linnean "Systema Naturæ" (1766), defined as consisting of those animals which have tentacles, cold white blood, and an inauriculate unilocular heart, and comprising all animals which Linnæus did not dispose under the five other classes Mammalia, Aves, Amphibia, Pisces, and Insecta (or vertebrates and insects). This class Vermes was divided into five orders, Intestina, Mollusca, Testacea, Lithophyta, and Zoöphyta, comprising all invertebrates except insects, and was thus the waste-basket of Linnæus (as Radiata was of Cuvier).

3. One of the eight primary divisions of the animal kingdom; a subkingdom or phylum, one of the leading types of animal life, comprising all those animals which have a body-cavity (Metazoa), no backbone (Invertebrata), normally an intestinal canal (which Cœlentera have not), not a radiate structure (which Echinodermata have), legs if any not jointed (they are always jointed in Arthropoda), and body vermiform if there are no legs. In this acceptation Vermes form a most comprehensive group, of great diversity of form, but agreeing in certain fundamental structural characters, being generally soft vermiform animals, oftenest segmented and bilaterally symmetrical, without limbs or with unjointed limbs. Vermes thus defined are approximately equivalent—(a) in Lamarck's system (1801–1812), to a class of animals divided into the four orders Molles, Rigiduli, Hispiduli, and Epizoariæ (the last including lernæan crustaceans); (b) in the Cuvierian classification (1817), to the whole of Cuvier's first class of Articulata (the annelids of Lamarck, or red-blooded worms with unjointed legs) plus his second and third classes of Radiata (Apoda and Entozoa), plus some of his fourth class of Radiata (some Polypi), plus his first order (Rotifera) of his fifth class of Radiata; (c) in Huxley's classification (1869), to the classes Polyzoa, Scolecida, Annelida, Chætognatha, and therefore to his two subkingdoms, Annuloida and Annulosa, without the Echinodermata of the former, and without the Crustacea, Arachnida, Myriapoda, and Insecta of the latter; or, in other terms, to his Annuloida minus Echinodermata and plus the whole of the anarthropodous Annulosa. Vermes as here defined have been divided into seven classes: (1) Platyelmintha, with three orders, respectively the turbellarian, trematoid, and cestoid worms; (2) Nematelmintha, with two orders, the nematoid and acanthocephalous worms—most of these two classes, excepting the Turbellaria, being entozoic or ectozoic parasites, as tapeworms, threadworms, etc.; (3) Chætognatha, based on the single exceptional form Sagitta; (4) Gephyrea (being Cuvier's second order of Echinodermata); (5) Annelida, or ordinary segmented worms, with four orders —Hirudinea (leeches), Oligochæta (earthworms, etc.), Polychæta (lobworms, sea-mice, etc.), and Cephalobranchia (tubicolous worms, etc.); (6) Rotifera, the wheel-animalcules; (7) Polyzoa (by most naturalists now dissociated from Vermes). Present systems raise nearly or quite all of the above classes to the rank of phyla bearing much the same names, and discard the word Vermes as the name of a phylum.

4. [l. c.] Plural of vermis.

Vermetacea (vėr-mē-tā′sē-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Vermetus + -acea.] Same as Vermetidæ.

Vermetidæ (vėr-met′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Vermetus + -idæ.] A family of tænioglossate gastropods, whose typical genus is Vermetus; the worm-shells. The animal has a reduced foot, a single elongated gill, short tentacles, and the eyes at the external sides of the tentacles. The operculum is corneous and circular. The young shells are regularly conic and spiral, like those of Turritella; but as they grow the whorls separate, and often become crooked or contorted.

Vermetus (vėr-mē'tus), n. [NL. (Adanson), < L. vermis, a worm: see worm.] The typical genus of Vermetidæ, having the later whorls of the shell separated and crooked or tortuous. The shell strikingly resembles the case or tube of some of the tubicolous worms, as the serpulas, and is affixed to shells, corals, and other substances. V. lumbricalis is a characteristic example.

Worm-shell (Vermetus lumbricalis).

vermian (vėr'mi-an), a. [< L. vermis, a worm, + -an.] Worm-like; of the nature of a worm; related to worms; of or pertaining to Vermes, in any sense: as, the supposed vermian ancestors of vertebrates.

In this point also we can make out an affinity with Vermian larvæ (Actinotrocha). Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 307.

Vermicella (vėr-mi-sel'ą), n. [NL. (Günther, 1858): cf. vermicelli.] A genus of colubriform serpents. V. annulata is the black and white ringed snake.

vermicelli (vėr-mi-sel'i or ver-mi-chel'li), n. [It., rolled paste, pl. of vermicello, a little worm, < ML. vermicellus*, dim. of L. vermis, a worm: see worm.] An Italian paste prepared of flour, cheese, yolks of eggs, sugar, and saffron, manufactured in the form of long slender threads, and so named on account of its worm-like appearance. Vermicelli is the same substance as macaroni, the only difference being that the latter is made larger, and is hollow while vermicelli is solid. Both are prepared in the greatest perfection at Naples, where they form a principal item in the food of the population, and are a favorite dish among all classes. Vermicelli is used in soups, broths, etc. See also spaghetti.

vermiceous (vėr-mish'ius), a. [< L. vermis, worm, + -ceous.] Worm-like; wormy; pertaining to worms. Also vermicious. [Rare.]

vermicidal (vėr'mi-sī-dal), a. [< vermicide + -al.] Destroying worms; having the quality or effect of a vermicide; anthelmintic.

vermicide (vėr'mi-sīd), n. [< L. vermis, worm, + -cīda, < cædere, kill.] A worm-killer; that which destroys worms: applied to those anthelmintic drugs which act by killing, and not simply expelling, parasitic worms, such as entozoans.

Some [anthelmintics] act obnoxiously on intestinal worms — destroying or injuring them. . . . These are . . . the vermicides of some authors. Pereira, Mat. Med. and Therap., p. 230.

vermicious (vėr-mish'us), a. See vermiceous.

vermicle (vėr'mi-kl), n. Same as vermicule. [Rare.]

We see many vermicles towards the outside of many of the oak-apples, which I guess were not what the primitive insects laid up in the germ from which the oak-apple had its rise. Derham, Physico-Theol., viii. 6, note.

vermicular (vėr-mik'ū-lăr), a. [= F. vermiculaire = Sp. Pg. vermicular = It. vermicolare, < ML. vermicularis, < L. vermiculus, a worm: see vermicule.] 1. Like a worm in form or movement; vermiform; tortuous or sinuous; also, writhing or wriggling.

In the jar containing the leeches had been introduced, by accident, one of the venomous vermicular sangsues which are now and then found in the neighbouring ponds. Poe, Tale of the Ragged Mountains.

2. Like the track or trace of a worm; appearing as if worm-eaten; vermiculate: as, vermicular erosions. — 3. Marked with fine, close-set, wavy or tortuous lines of color; vermiculated. — 4. In bot., shaped like a worm; thick, and almost cylindrical, but bent in different places, as some roots. — Vermicular appendix or process. Same as vermiform appendix (which see, under appendix). — Vermicular or vermiculated work. (a) A sort of ornamental work consisting of winding frets or knots in mosaic pavements, resembling the tracks of worms.

Vermicular Masonry. — Palace of the Louvre, Paris.

(b) A form of rusticated masonry which is so wrought as to appear thickly indented with worm-tracks. See rustic work, under rustic.

vermiculate (vėr-mik'ū-lāt), v.; pret. and pp. vermiculated, ppr. vermiculating. [< L. vermiculatus, pp. of vermiculari, be full of worms, be worm-eaten, < vermiculus, a little worm: see vermicule.] I. intrans. To become full of worms; be eaten by worms.

Speak, doth his body there vermiculate,
Crumble to dust, and feel the laws of fate?
Elegy upon Dr. Donne.

II. trans. To ornament with winding and waving lines, as if caused by the movement of worms.

Set up [certain pillars] originally with the bark on, the worms worked underneath it in secret, at a novel sort of decoration, until the bark came off and exposed the stems most beautifully vermiculated. C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 157.

Finely vermiculated with dusky waves. Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 338.

Vermiculated mosaic, an ancient Roman mosaic of the most delicate and elaborate character; the Roman opus vermiculatum. The name has reference to the arrangement of the small tesseræ in curved and waving lines as required by the shading of the design. — Vermiculated work. See vermicular work, under vermicular.

vermiculate (vėr-mik'ū-lāt), a. [< L. vermiculatus, pp. of vermiculari, be full of worms, be worm-eaten: see vermiculate, v.] 1. In zoöl.: (a) Forming a vermiculation; fine, close-set, and wavy or tortuous, as color-marks; vermicular: as, vermiculate color-markings. (b) In entomology: (1) Marked with tortuous impressions, as if worm-eaten, as the elytra of certain beetles; vermiculated. (2) Having thick-set tufts of parallel hairs. — 2. Full of worms; infested with worms; worm-eaten.

It is the property of good and sound knowledge to putrify and dissolve into a number of subtle, idle, unwholesome, and . . . vermiculate questions. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, i.

vermiculation (vėr-mik-ū-lā'shon), n. [= Sp. vermiculación, < L. vermiculatio(n-), a being worm-eaten, < vermiculari, be worm-eaten: see vermiculate, v.] 1. The action or movement of a worm; hence, a continuous or progressive motion along the bowels, which is strikingly like the action of successive joints of a worm in crawling; peristaltic action.

My heart moves naturally by the motion of palpitation; my blood by motion of circulation, excretion, perspiration; my guts by the motion of vermiculation. Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 31.

2. Formation of worm-like figures or tracery; vermicular ornamentation, whether of form or of color; a set or system of vermiculate lines. See cuts under rustic and vermicular.

The dusky vermiculation of the under parts [of a shrike]. Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 337.

3. The act or art of producing vermiculated ornament. — 4. Worminess; the state of being wormy or worm-eaten, literally or figuratively.

This huge olive, which flourished so long, . . . fell, as they say, of vermiculation, being all worm-eaten within. Howell, Vocall Forrest, p. 70.

vermicule (vėr'mi-kūl), n. [< L. vermiculus, dim. of vermis, a worm: see worm. Cf. vermicle, vermeil.] A little worm or grub; a small worm-like body or object. Also, rarely, vermicle.

vermiculi (vėr-mik'ū-lī), n. Plural of vermiculus.

vermiculite (vėr-mik'ū-līt), n. [< L. vermiculus, a worm, + *-ite*2.] In mineral., one of a group of hydrous silicates having a micaceous structure, and in most cases derived from the common micas by alteration. When heated nearly to redness they exfoliate largely, and some kinds project out with a vermicular motion, as if they were a mass of small worms (whence the name).

vermiculose (vėr-mik'ū-lōs), a [< LL. vermiculosus, full of worms, wormy, < L. vermiculus, a little worm: see vermicule.] 1. Full of worms; wormy; worm-eaten. — 2. Worm-like; vermiform; vermicular.

vermiculous (vėr-mik'ū-lus), a. Same as vermiculose.

vermiculus (vėr-mik'ū-lus), n.; pl. vermiculi (-lī). [< L. vermiculus, a little worm: see vermicule.] 1. A little worm or grub. — 2†. Specifically, the kermes- or cochineal-insect; also, its product, known as worm-dye. See vermilion, 1. Also vermiculum.

vermiform (vėr'mi-fôrm), a. [< NL. vermiformis, < L. vermis, worm, + forma, form.] Worm-like in form: shaped like a worm; vermicular. (a) Long and slender; of small caliber in proportion to length; cylindrical: as, the vermiform body of a weasel; the vermiform tongue of the ant-eater. See cuts under ant-bear and tamandua.

This [a fibrinous clot in the heart], when drawn from its position, revealed a kind of vermiform prolongation that extended along the tube of the artery. J. M. Carnochan, Operative Surgery, p. 167.

(b) Related to a worm in structure; allied or belonging to the Vermes; vermian; helminthic; annuloid or annulose. (c) Specifically, in entom.: (1) Noting any maggot or maggot-like larva, as those of most Hymenoptera and Diptera. (2) Noting certain worm-like polyphagous larvæ, with only rudimentary antennæ, and apodous or with very short legs like tubercles, as those of most weevils and longicorns. — Vermiform appendix. See appendix. — Vermiform echinoderms, the gephyreans or spoonworms. See Vermigrada. — Vermiform embryos, in Dicyemida, embryos produced by a nematogenous dicyema. See Dicyema (with cut) and Nematogena. — Vermiform holothurians, the Synaptidæ. See cuts under echinopædium and Synaptidæ. — Vermiform process. (a) Same as vermiform appendix. (b) The vermis of the cerebellum.

Vermiformia (vėr-mi-fôr'mi-ą), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of vermiformis: see vermiform.] In Lankester's classification of molluscoids, the first section of the third class of Podaxonia, containing only the genus Phoronis.

vermifugal (vėr-mif'ū-gal), a. [< vermifuge + -al.] Having the character, quality, or effect of a vermifuge; tending to expel parasitic worms; anthelmintic; vermicidal.

vermifuge (vėr'mi-fūj), n. [< F. vermifuge = Sp. vermífugo = Pg. It. vermifugo, expelling worms, < L. vermis, worm, + fugare, put to flight, expel, < fugire, flee.] A remedy employed to effect the dislodgment and expulsion of intestinal worms.

To rescue from oblivion the merit of his vermifuge medicines. Edinburgh Rev., XL. 48.

vermiglia (vėr-mil'ią), n. [< It. vermiglia, a sort of precious stone, < vermiglio, bright-red: see vermeil.] A scorpænoid fish, the rock-cod, Sebastichthys chlorostictus. [Monterey, California.]

Vermigrada (vėr-mig'rā-dą), n. pl. [NL. (Forbes), neut. pl. of vermigradus: see vermigrade.] The so-called vermiform echinoderms; the gephyreans or spoonworms and their allies, formerly regarded as an order of Echinodermata. See cut under Sipunculus.

vermigrade (vėr'mi-grād), a. [< NL. vermigradus, < L. vermis, a worm, + gradi, step.] Moving like a worm; wriggling along: noting the Vermigrada.

vermilt, n. An obsolete form of vermeil.

Vermileo (vėr-mil'ē-ō), n. [NL. (Macquart, 1834), < It. vermiglio = F. vermeil.] A genus of snipe-flies, of the family Leptidæ. The larvæ form pitfalls like the ant-lions.

vermilingual (vėr-mi-ling'gwal), a. Same as vermilinguial.

Vermilingues (vėr-mi-ling'gwēz), n. pl. Same as Vermilinguia, 2.

Vermilinguia (vėr-mi-ling'gwi-ą), n. pl. [NL., < L. vermis, a worm, + lingua, tongue.] 1. In Illiger's classification (1811), a family of edentates composed of the ant-eaters, aardvarks, and pangolins, as distinguished from the armadillos (Cingulata), both these being families of his ninth order, Effodientia: now restricted to the American ant-eaters, as a subordinal group. See cuts under ant-bear and tamandua. — 2. In herpet., a superfamily of lizards, including only the chameleons; the Dendrosaura or Rhiptoglossa. Also Vermilingues. See cut under chameleon.

vermilinguial (vėr-mi-ling'gwi-al), a. [As Vermilinguia + -al.] 1. Having a vermiform tongue, as an ant-eater or a chameleon; belonging to the Vermilinguia. See cut under tamandua. — 2. In ornith., same as sagittilingual. See cut under sagittilingual.

vermilion (vėr-mil'yon), n. and a. [Formerly also vermillion, virmilion; OF. vermillon, a bright red, also the kermes-insect, also a little word, F. vermillon, vermilion (= Sp. bermellón = Pg. vermelhão = It. vermiglione, vermilion), < vermeil, bright-red: see vermeil.] I. n. 1†. The kermes- or cochineal-insect; also, the product of cochineal; worm-dye. — 2. The red sulphid of mercury, or the mineral cinnabar, occurring in nature of a red-brown to a carmine-red color; also, a pigment formerly made by grinding selected pieces of native cinnabar, but now made artificially. The pigment is produced in two ways. (a) In the wet way mercury, sulphur, potash, and water are mixed together in proper proportions, put into horizontal iron cylinders containing agitators, and stirred constantly for about an hour. The mass first turns black, then brick-red, and finally acquires the desired vermilion-red color. The potash is simply a carrier, and does not enter into the composition of the finished product. (b) In the dry way mercury and sulphur are mixed and heated in a kind of retort, the vermilion red subliming over. By slight variations in the process the color may be made pale or deep in shade, and may even be made at will to incline toward scarlet, crimson, or orange. As a pigment it is permanent, becoming dark rather than light on exposure. It possesses great body, and is a very brilliant and vivid red, toning toward orange. It is used extensively in painting and decorating, for making red sealing-wax, and for other purposes. The name artificial vermilion is also applied to a vermilion red made by precipitating the coal-tar color eosin on orange mineral. It is quite equal in color, brilliancy, and body to that made from quicksilver; but it is not very permanent under the direct action of the sun, unless protected by a coat of varnish.

3. A color such as that of the above pigment; a beautiful brilliant red color.

> The armes, that earst so bright did show,
> Into a pure vermillion now are dyde.
> Spenser, F. Q., I. v. 9.

4. A cotton cloth dyed with vermilion.

> They buy Cotton Wooll in London, that comes first from Cyprus and Smyrna, and at home worke the same, and perfit into Fustians, Vermilions, Dymities, and other such Stuffes, and then returne it to London.
> L. Roberts, Treasure of Traffikke, quoted in A. Barlow's [Weaving, p. 26.

5. Same as vermeil, 4.

> Several Gold Rings set with Turky and Vermillions.
> Quoted in Ashton's Social Life in Reign of Queen [Anne, I. 181.

Antimony vermilion. See antimony.—Orange vermilion. See orange[1].

II. a. Of the color of vermilion; of the brilliant pure-red color common in the bloom of the single scarlet geranium: as, a vermilion dye.

> The land of tears gave forth a blast of wind,
> And fulminated a vermilion light,
> Which overmastered in me every sense,
> And as a man whom sleep hath seized I fell.
> Longfellow, tr. of Dante's Inferno, iii. 134.

Vermilion border, the red part of the human lips, where the skin passes over into mucous membrane.—Vermilion flycatcher, a small tyrant-bird of the genus Pyrocephalus, as P. rubineus, about 6 inches long, the male of which is dark-brown with all the under parts and a full globular crest vermilion-red or crimson. A bird of this kind inhabits Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, California, and the regions southward; and several others are found in the warmer parts of America. See cut under Pyrocephalus.—Vermilion lacquer. Same as coral lacquer (which see, under coral).

vermilion (vėr-mil'yon), v. t. [< vermilion, n.] To color with or as with vermilion; dye red; cover or suffuse with a bright red.

> A sprightly red vermilions all her face.
> Granville, A Receipt for Vapours.

vermily† (vėr'mi-li), n. [Irreg. extended from vermil, vermeil.] Same as vermilion. Spenser, F. Q., III. viii. 6.

vermin (vėr'min), n. [Formerly also vermine (also dial. varmin, varmint, varment); < ME. vermine, vermyne, < OF. (and F.) vermine = Pr. vermena = It. vermine, vermin, noxious insects, etc., as if < L. vermineus* or verminus*, < vermis, a worm: see worm.] 1. Any noxious or troublesome animal: mostly used in a collective sense.

> Your woful moder wende stedfastly
> That cruel houndes or som foul vermyne > Hadde eten yow. Chaucer, Clerk's Tale, l. 1039.

(a) A worm; a reptile.

> No heart have you, or such
> As fancies, like the vermin in a nut,
> Have fretted all to dust and bitterness.
> Tennyson, Princess, vi.

(b) A noxious or disgusting insect, especially a parasite; particularly, a louse, a bedbug, or a flea. (c) A mammal or bird injurious to game, and mischievous or troublesome in game-preserves: chiefly an English usage. Such quadrupeds as badgers, otters, weasels, polecats, rats, and mice, and such birds as hawks and owls, are all called vermin.

> Inhuman devill! think some fatall hower
> Will bring huge troupes of vermine to devoure > Thy graine & thee.
> Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 99.

> They [of Java Major] feede on Cats, Rats, and other vermine. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 540.

> Like a vermin or a wolf, when their time comes they die and perish, and in the mean time do no good.
> Jer. Taylor, Holy Living, i. 1.

> It is not so much to me and my fraternity as those base vermin the Otters. I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 21.

Hence—2. A contemptible or obnoxious person; a low or vile fellow; also, such persons collectively.

> You are my prisoners, base vermine.
> S. Butler, Hudibras, II. iii. 1072.

> Sir, this vermin of court reporters, when they are forced into day upon one point, are sure to burrow in another.
> Burke, Amer. Taxation.

vermin† (vėr'min), v. t. [< vermin, n.] To rid or clear of vermin.

> Get warrener bound
> To vermine thy ground.
> Tusser, Husbandry, January's Abstract.

verminate (vėr'mi-nāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. verminated, ppr. verminating. [< L. verminare, have worms, have crawling pains (cf. vermina, gripes, belly-ache), < vermis, worm: see vermin.] To breed vermin; become infested with worms, lice, or other parasites.

vermination (vėr-mi-nā'shon), n. [< L. vermination(n-), worms (as a disease), also crawling pains, < verminare, have worms, have crawling pains: see verminate.] The generation or breeding of worms or other parasites; parasitic infestation, as by intestinal worms; helminthiasis; phthiriasis; the lousy disease.

verminer† (vėr'mi-nėr), n. A terrier.

> The beagles, the lurchers, and lastly, the verminers, or, as we should call them, the terriers.
> Ainsworth, Lancashire Witches, iii. 1.

vermin-killer (vėr'min-kil″ėr), n. One who or that which kills vermin.

verminly† (vėr'min-li), a. [< vermin + -ly[1].] Like or characteristic of vermin.

> They have nothing in them but a verminly nimbleness and subtlety, being bred out of the putrefactions of men's brains. Bp. Gauden, Hieraspistes (1653), p. 379. (Latham.) verminous (vėr'mi-nus), a. [= F. vermineux = Sp. Pg. It. verminoso, < L. verminosus, full of worms, < vermis, worm: see vermin.] 1. Tending to verminate, or breed vermin; affected with vermination; infested with parasitic vermin: as, verminous carrion.

> Verminous and polluted rags dropt over-worn from the toyling shoulders of Time. Milton, Prelatical Episcopacy.

> Or how long he had held verminous occupation of his blanket and skewer. Dickens, Tom Tiddler's Ground, i.

2. Due to the presence of vermin; caused by vermin: as, verminous ulcers. See phthiriasis. —3. Of the nature of or consisting of vermin; like vermin.

> Do you place me in the rank of verminous fellows,
> To destroy things for wages?
> Middleton and Rowley, Changeling, iii. 4.

> That soft class of devotees who feel > Reverence for life so deeply that they spare
> The verminous brood.
> Wordsworth, The Borderers, ii.

Verminous and murderous muckworm of the Parisian Commune. Swinburne, Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLII. 176.

Verminous crasis†, a diseased condition supposed to be due to the presence of intestinal worms.—Verminous fever, a fever due to the presence of intestinal worms.

verminously (vėr'mi-nus-li), adv. In a verminous manner, or to a verminous degree; so as to breed worms; as if infested by worms: as, verminously unclean.

vermiparous (vėr-mip'a-rus), a. [< L. vermis, worm, + parere, bear, + -ous.] Producing or breeding worms.

> A generation of eggs, or some vermiparous separation.
> Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 20.

vermis (vėr'mis), n.; pl. vermes (-mēz). [L., a worm: see worm.] In anat., the median lobe or division of the cerebellum; the vermiform process of the cerebellum, divided into prevermis and postvermis.

Vermivora (vėr-miv'ō-rą), n. [NL. (Swainson, 1827), < L. vermis, a worm, + vorare, devour.] A genus of birds, the American worm-eating warblers: now divided into several other genera, including Helmintherus (Helinaia or Helonæa) and Helminthophaga (or Helminthophila). (See warbler, swamp-warbler, and cut under Helminthophaga.) The name was applied by Lesson in 1831 to a different genus (of the family Tyrannidæ), and had been used by Meyer in 1822 in another sense.

vermivorous (vėr-miv'ō-rus), a. [< L. vermis, worm, + vorare, devour, + -ous.] Worm-eating; feeding on worms; devouring grubs; erucivorous; campophagous.

Vermonter (vėr-mon'tėr), n. [< Vermont (see def.) + -er[1].] A native or an inhabitant of Vermont, one of the New England States of the United States of America.

> In 1776 the Vermonters sought admission to the provincial Congress. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 168.

vermuth, vermouth (vėr'mōth), n. [= F. vermout, wermouth, < G. wermuth, wormwood, = AS. wermōd, wormwood: see wormwood.] A sort of mild cordial consisting of white wine flavored with wormwood and other ingredients. It is prepared chiefly in France and Italy, that of Turin being the most esteemed, and its special use is to stimulate the appetite by its bitterness.

vernacle[1] (vėr'ną-kl), n. [< L. vernaculus, native, vernacular: see vernacular.] A vernacular word, term, or expression. [Rare.]

> Vernacles or vernacular terms.
> Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, VIII. 518.

vernacle[2]† (vėr'ną-kl), n. A Middle English form of vernicle.

vernacular (vėr-nak'ū-lär), a. and n. [< L. vernaculus, native, domestic, indigenous, of or pertaining to home-born slaves, < verna, a native, a home-born slave (one born in his master's house), lit. 'dweller,' < √ vas = Skt. √ vas, dwell: see was.] I. a. 1. Native; indigenous; belonging to the country of one's birth; belonging to the speech that one naturally acquires: as, English is our vernacular language. The word is always, or almost always, used of the native language or ordinary idiom of a place.

> This [Welsh] is one of the fourteen vernacular and independent Tongues of Europe, and she hath divers Dialects. Howell, Letters, ii. 55.

> The tongues which now are called learned were indeed vernacular when first the Scriptures were written in them.
> Evelyn, True Religion, I. 367.

> An ancient father of his valley, one who is thoroughly vernacular in his talk. De Quincey, Style, ii.

2. Hence, specifically, characteristic of a locality: as, vernacular architecture.—Vernacular disease, a disease which prevails in a particular country or district; an epidemic, or more accurately an endemic, disease.

II. n. One's mother-tongue; the native idiom of a place; by extension, the language of a particular calling.

> He made a version of Aristotle's Ethics into the vernacular. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., i. 2.

> The English Church . . . had obtained the Bible in English, and the use of the chief forms of prayer in the vernacular. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 261.

> On the bar we found friends that we had made in Panama, who had preceded us a few days, long enough to speak the vernacular of mining, and to pride themselves on being "old miners." The Century, XLII. 128.

vernacularism (vėr-nak'ū-lär-izm), n. [< vernacular + -ism.] 1. A vernacular word or expression. Quarterly Rev.—2. The use of the vernacular: the opposite of classicalism.

vernacularity (vėr-nak-ū-lar'i-ti), n.; pl. vernacularities (-tiz). [< vernacular + -ity.] A vernacularism; an idiom.

> Rustic Annandale, . . . with its homely honesties, rough vernacularities.
> Carlyle, Reminiscences (Edward Irving), p. 264

vernacularization (vėr-nak″ū-lär-i-zā'shon), n. [< vernacularize + -ation.] The act or process of making vernacular; the state of being made vernacular.

> Thousands of words and uses of words, on their first appearance or revival as candidates for vernacularization, must have met with repugnance, expressed or unexpressed. F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 105.

vernacularize (vėr-nak'ū-lär-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. vernacularized, ppr. vernacularizing. [< vernacular + -ize.] To make vernacular; vernaculate.

vernacularly (vėr-nak'ū-lär-li), adv. In accordance with the vernacular manner; in the vernacular.

vernaculate (vėr-nak'ū-lāt), v. t.; pret. and pp vernaculated, ppr. vernaculating. [< L. vernaculus, native, + -ate[2].] To express in a vernacular idiom; give a local name to. [Rare.]

> Very large Antwerp [red raspberry] "patches," as they are vernaculated by the average fruit-grower.
> New York Semi-weekly Tribune, July 15, 1887.

vernaculous† (vėr-nak'ū-lus), a. [= Sp. vernáculo = Pg. It. vernaculo, < L. vernaculus, native, domestic, of or pertaining to home-born slaves: see vernacular.] 1. Vernacular.

> Their vernaculous and mother tongues.
> Sir T. Browne, Tracts, viii.

2. Of or belonging to slaves or the rabble; hence, scurrilous; insolent; scoffing. [A Latinism.]

> The petulancy of every vernaculous orator.
> B. Jonson, Volpone, Ded.

vernage† (vėr'nāj), n. [< ME. vernage, < OF. vernage, < It. vernaccia, "a kind of strong wine like malmesie or mukadine or bastard wine" (Florio, 1598) (ML. vernachia), lit. 'winter wine,' < vernaccio, a severe winter, < verno, winter, = It. Pg. inverno = Sp. invierno = F. hiver, winter, < L. hibernus, pertaining to winter: see hibernate.] A kind of white wine.

> He drynketh ypocras, clarree, and vernage,
> Of spices hoote, to encressen his corage.
> Chaucer, Merchant's Tale, l. 563.

> Sche brougthe hem Vernage and Crete.
> Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 111, Index.

vernal (vėr'nal), a. [< F. vernal = Pr. Sp. Pg. vernal = It. vernale, < LL. vernalis, of the spring, vernal, < L. ver, spring: see ver.] 1. Of or pertaining to the spring; belonging to the spring; appearing in spring: as, vernal bloom.

> In those vernal seasons of the year, when the air is calm and pleasant, it were an injury and sullenness against Nature not to go out and see her riches.
> Milton, Education.

> The vernal breeze that drives the fogs before it, . . . if augmented to a tempest, will . . . desolate the garden.
> Goldsmith, National Concord.

> And beg an alms of spring-time, ne'er denied > Indoors by vernal Chaucer.
> Lowell, Under the Willows.

2. Of or belonging to youth, the springtime of life.

The vernal fancies and sensations of your time of life.
Choate, Addresses, p. 134.

3. In bot., appearing in spring: as, vernal flowers.—4. Done or accomplished in spring: as, the vernal migration or molt of birds.—Vernal equinox. See equinox, and equinoctial points (under equinoctial).—Vernal fever, malarial fever.—Vernal grass, a grass, Anthoxanthum odoratum, native in the northern Old World, introduced in North America. It is a slender plant a foot or two high, with a loose cylindrical spike. From the presence of coumarin it exhales an agreeable odor, especially at flowering time, and though not specially nutritious is prized as an admixture in hay for the sake of its flavor. Often called sweet vernal grass, spring grass, sometimes sweet-scented grass.—Vernal signs, the signs in which the sun appears in spring.—Vernal whitlow-grass. See whitlow-grass.

vernally (vėr'nal-i), adv. In a vernal manner.

vernant (vėr'nant), a. [< L. vernan(t-)s, ppr. of vernare, flourish, bloom: see vernate.] Flourishing as in spring; vernal.

Else had the spring
Perpetual smiled on earth with vernant flowers.
Milton, P. L., x. 679.

vernate (vėr'nāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. vernated, ppr. vernating. [< L. vernatus, pp. of vernare, flourish, bloom, < vernus, of the spring: see vernal.] To be vernant; flourish.

vernation (vėr-nā'shon), n. [< L. vernatio(n-), found only in the particular sense the sloughing or shedding of the skin of snakes, the slough itself, lit. 'renewing of youth,' < vernare, be like spring, bloom, flourish, renew itself, of a snake, to shed its skin, slough: see vernate.] In bot., the disposition of the nascent leaves within the bud, not with reference to their insertion, but with regard to their folding, coiling, etc., taken singly or together. It is also called prefoliation, and the word corresponds to the terms estivation and prefloration, which indicate the manner in which the parts of the flower are arranged in the flower-bud. For the particular forms of vernation, see the terms plicate, conduplicate, inflexed, convolute, involute, revolute, and circinate.

vernicle (vėr'ni-kl), n. [< ME. vernicle, vernacle, vernakylle, < ML. veronicula, dim. of veronica: see veronica.] A handkerchief impressed with the face of Christ: same as veronica, 1.

A vernicle hadde he sowed on his cappe.
Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 685.

The vernicle, as worn by pilgrims, was a copy of the handkerchief of St. Veronica, which was miraculously impressed with the features of our Lord.
Piers Plowman (ed. Skeat), II. 101, notes.

vernier (vėr'ni-ėr), n. [< F. vernier, named after Pierre Vernier (1580–1637), who invented the instrument in 1631.] A small movable scale, running parallel with the fixed scale of a sextant, theodolite, barometer, or other graduated instrument, and used for measuring a fractional part of one of the equal divisions on the graduated fixed scale or arc. It consists, in its simplest form, of a small sliding scale, the divisions of which differ from those of the primary scale. A space is taken equal to an exact number of parts of the primary scale, and is divided into a number of equal parts either greater by 1 or less by 1 than the number that it covers on the primary scale. Fig. 1 represents the vernier of the common barometer for measuring to the hundredth of an inch.

Fig. 1.

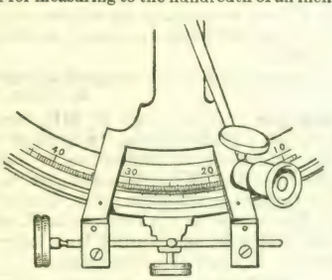

Fig. 2.

Verniers.

The scale is divided into inches and tenths of inches; the small movable scale is the vernier, which consists of a length of eleven parts of the main scale divided into ten equal parts—each part being therefore equal to eleven tenths of a division on the main scale, and the difference between a scale-division and a vernier-division being one hundredth of an inch. To use the vernier, the zero or top line of it is set to coincide with the top of the barometric column, which in the figure stands between 30.1 and 30.2 inches. If the zero of the vernier were set to coincide with 30.1 inches on the scale, the first division would be one hundredth of an inch below 30 on the scale, division 2 two hundredths below 29.9, and so on, division 10 coinciding with 29 inches. Hence, as the vernier is raised its divisions coincide successively with scale-divisions, and the numbers on the vernier correspond to the hundredths it has been raised. In the figure the coincidence is at the seventh vernier-division—that is, the vernier stands seven hundredths of an inch above 30.1, and the height of the mercury is therefore 30.17 inches. Fig. 2 represents part of the limb of a sextant with a vernier. Also called nonius. See also cuts under caliper, square, and transit.—Vernier-scale sight. See sight[1].

vernile (vėr'nil), a. [< L. vernilis, servile, < verna, a home-born slave: see vernacular.] Suiting a slave; servile; slavish. [Rare.]

Vernile scurrility. De Quincey. (Imp. Dict.)

vernility (vėr-nil'i-ti), n. [< L. vernilita(t-)s, servility; < vernilis, servile: see servile.] The character or state of being vernile; servility. Blount, 1670. [Rare.]

vernisht, v. An obsolete form of varnish.

vernix (vėr'niks), n. [NL., varnish: see varnish.] In med., used in the phrase vernix caseosa, a fatty matter covering the skin of the fetus.

Vernonia (vėr-nō'ni-ą), n. [NL. (Schreber, 1791), named after William Vernon, an English botanist, who collected plants in Maryland near the end of the 17th century.] A genus of composite plants, type of the tribe Vernonieæ and subtribe Euvernonieæ. It is characterized by a polymorphous inflorescence, usually with a naked receptacle, ten-ribbed achenes, and a pappus of two or three series, the inner slender, copious, and elongated, the outer much shorter, often more chaffy, sometimes absent. There are about 475 species. They are chiefly tropical, abundant in America, numerous in Africa, and frequent in Asia. A few occur beyond the tropics, in North and South America and South Africa. One Asiatic species, V. cinerea, is very common also in Australia, and is naturalized in the West Indies. None occurs in Europe. They are shrubs or herbs, usually with straight, crisped, woolly or tangled hairs, rarely stellate or scurfy. The leaves are alternate, entire or toothed, feather-veined, petioled or sessile, but not decurrent; in V. oppositifolia and V. eupatorifolia of Brazil they are opposite. The fruit consists of smooth or hirsute achenes, commonly glandular between the ribs. The flowers are purple, red, bluish, or rarely white; they form terminal flower-heads, which are usually cymose and panicled, or corymbose, sometimes solitary or glomerate. The large section Lepidoploa includes over 200 American species, chiefly with many-flowered subspherical corymbed heads; to this belong the 10 or more species of the United States, which are known as ironweed, perhaps from the hardness of their stems, and are peculiar in their usually crimson flowers, brown or rusty-colored pappus, and resinous dotted achenes. They are polymorphous, and disposed to hybridize. V. Noveboracensis, also known as flattop, extends north to New England; V. glauca, to Pennsylvania; and V. fasciculata, to Ohio and the Dakotas; the others are chiefly southwestern. V. arborescens is the fleabane of Jamaica. A decoction of V. cinerea is used in India as a febrifuge. The small black seeds of V. anthelmintica, a common annual of India, yield by pressure a solid green oil known as khatzum- or kinka-oil, esteemed of value in the arts.

vernoniaceous (vėr-nō-ni-ā'shius), a. In bot., belonging to the tribe Vernonieæ; resembling or related to the genus Vernonia.

Vernonieæ (vėr-nō-ni'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1836), < Vernonia + -eæ.] A tribe of composite plants, characterized by flower-heads with all the flowers similar and tubular, and usually by setose or chaffy pappus and alternate leaves. From the Eupatorieæ, the other similar tribe of uniformly tubular-flowered Asteraceæ, it is further distinguished by its sagittate anthers and its subulate style-branches, which are usually much elongated, stigmatose along the inner side, and minutely hispid externally. It includes 41 genera, classed in 5 groups or series—one of these series, the subtribe Lychnophorinæ, peculiar in its densely glomerate small flower-heads, the others composing the subtribe Vernoninæ, with the flower-heads separate, and usually panicled or solitary. They are herbs or shrubs, rarely trees. Their leaves are alternate (except in 3 species), not opposite, as commonly in the Eupatorieæ, and are entire or toothed, not dissected, as often in other composite tribes. Their flowers are purple, violet, or white, never yellow, frequent as that color is in the order. One genus, Stokesia, is blue-flowered. Two genera, Elephantopus and Vernonia (the type), extend into the middle United States. The tribe abounds in monotypic genera, chiefly Brazilian, with two confined to the West Indies, one to Australia, and three or four to tropical Africa.

Verona brown. See brown.

Veronese (ver-ō-nēs' or -nēz'), a. and n. [< Verona (see def.) + -ese. Cf. L. Veronensis.] I. a. In geog., of or pertaining to Verona, a city and province of northern Italy.—Veronese green. See green[1].

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Verona.

veronica (vē-ron'i-ką), n. [In ME. veronike and verony, < OF. veronique, F. véronique = Sp. verónica = Pg. It. veronica; < ML. veronica, a napkin supposed to be impressed with the face of Christ (popularly connected with L. vera, true, + LGr. εἰκών, image: see very, icon), < Veronica, the traditional name of the woman who wiped the Saviour's face, ult. identical with Berenice, Bernice, the traditional name of the woman cured of the issue of blood, L. Berenīce, also Beronīce, and contr. Bernīce, < Gr. Βερενίκη, the name of the daughter of King Agrippa and of other women, Macedonian form of Gr. φερενίκη, lit. 'bearer of victory,' < φέρειν, = E. bear[1], + νίκη, victory (see Nike). Hence ult. vernicle.] 1. A napkin or piece of cloth impressed with the face of Christ: from the legend that a woman named Veronica wiped the face of Christ with her handkerchief when he was on his way to Calvary, and that the likeness of the face was miraculously impressed upon the cloth. Also vernicle.—2. [cap.] [NL. (Rivinus, 1690; earlier, about 1554, by Mattioli).] A genus of dicotyledonous sympetalous plants, of the order Scrophulariaceæ and tribe Digitaleæ. It is characterized by opposite lower leaves, a wheel-shaped corolla with a very short tube and spreading lobes, and by two stamens with their anther-cells confluent at the apex. About 200 species are recognized by recent authors. They are widely scattered through temperate and cold regions of both hemispheres, and are usually low herbs, their stem-leaves almost always plainly opposite, but the floral leaves always alternate, and commonly diminished into bracts. The flowers are blue, often penciled with violet, and varying to purple, pink, or white, but never yellow; they form terminal or axillary racemes, or are solitary and sessile in the axils. The fruit is a loculicidal or four-valved capsule, often obtuse or notched, rarely acute. The species are known as speedwell, especially V. Chamædrys, also called forget-me-not (see speedwell). A few are of medicinal repute. Leptandra Virginica, known as black-root

Thyme-leaved Speedwell (Veronica serpyllifolia).
a, an entire plant; b, a flower; c, fruit.

and Culver's-root or Culver's-physic, a tall perennial with wand-like stem from 2 to 6 feet high, and a white spike from 6 to 10 inches long, occurring in Canada, and in the eastern and central United States, is sometimes referred to this genus. The leaves of V. officinalis have been used as a medicinal tea; the so-called Mont Cenis tea is from V. Allionii. Twelve species are natives of England, 75 of Europe, 6 of Alaska, and 14 of the United States proper, three or four of which are confined to North America: of these V. Cusickii is a large-flowered alpine plant of Oregon and California, and V. Americana is known as brooklime, a petiolate aquatic with purple-striped pale-blue flowers, distributed from Pennsylvania and New Mexico to Alaska. The similar V. Beccabunga of the old world is the original brooklime. Five other species are now naturalized in the United States; of these, V. peregrina and V. serpyllifolia are almost cosmopolitan. (See neckweed, 1, and betony.) For V. hederæfolia, see henbit; and for V. officinalis, see speedwell (with cut) and fluellen. Many foreign species (at least fifty) are valued for cultivation in gardens, as V. elatior, or for rockeries, as V. repens, a creeper forming a mat of pale-blue flowers. Many are of variegated colors, as V. fruticans, an alpine plant with blue violet-striped flowers, narrowly ringed with crimson around the white center. Numerous species occur in high southern latitudes, 15 in Australia, and 40 in New Zealand, one of which, V. elliptica, extends to Cape Horn, and sometimes becomes a small tree 20 feet high. The genus reaches its greatest development in New Zealand, where it is present in remarkable beauty and abundance. Nearly all the species are shrubby, usually from 2 to 6 feet high, and are cultivated under glass, especially V. salicifolia and V. speciosa, with wine-colored flowers, the largest-leafed species, as also V. formosa of Tasmania. V. buxifolia, with purple-veined white flowers, is sometimes known as New Zealand box; and V. perfoliata, of southern Australia, as digger's-speedwell. V. tetragona of New Zealand, from its hard imbricated decussate connate leaves, has been mistaken for a conifer.

verrayt, verrayliche†. Middle English forms of very, verily.

verret, n. [ME., < OF. (and F.) verre, < L. vitrum, glass: see vitreous. The same word is contained in sandiver and ult. in varnish.] Glass.

Forthy, who that hath an hede of verre
Fro caste of stones war hym in the werre.
Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 867.

verré, verrey (ve-rā'), a. In her., same as vairé.

verrelt, n. An obsolete form of ferrule[2].

verriculate (ve-rik'ū-lāt), a. [< verricule + -ate[1].] In entom., covered with verricules.

verricule (ver'i-kūl), n. [< L. verriculum, a drag-net, < verrere, sweep.] In entom., a thick-set tuft of upright parallel hairs.

★verruca (ve-rö′kä), n.; pl. verrucæ (-sē). [NL., < L. verruca, a wart, a steep place, a height.] 1. In pathol., a wart.—2. In bot.: (a) a wart or gland; (b) a sessile apothecium; (c) a perithecium of certain fungi. [Rarely used.]—3. In zoöl., a small, flattish, wart-like prominence; a verruciform tubercle.—4. [cap.] A genus of cirripeds, typical of the Verrucidæ.

verrucano (ver-ö-kä′nō), n. [< It. verrucana, a hard stone used in crushing-mills, < verruca, < L. verruca, a wart.] The name given by Alpine geologists to a conglomerate of more or less imperfectly rounded fragments of white or pale-red quartz, varying in size from that of a grain of sand up to that of an egg, held together by a cement of reddish, greenish, or violet-colored silicious or talcose material. It occurs in numerous localities both north and south of the Alps, and in northern Italy, sometimes in masses of great thickness, which often take on a gneissoid or schistose structure. In certain localities the verrucano overlies a slaty rock which contains plants of Carboniferous age: hence some geologists have considered it as belonging to that formation, while others have regarded it as the equivalent of the Rothliegende, the lower division of the Permian.

Verrucaria (ver-ö-kā′ri-ä), n. [NL. (Persoon), < L. verrucaria, a plant that drives away warts, < verruca, a wart.] A genus of angiocarpous lichens, typical of the family Verrucariaceæ.

Verrucariaceæ (ver-ö-kā-ri-ā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Verrucaria + -aceæ.] A family of angiocarpous lichens, having globular apothecia which open only by a pore at the summit, and a proper exciple covering a similarly shaped hymenium, which is in turn included in a more or less distinguishable envelop. Also, less properly, Verrucariacei, Verrucariæi.

verrucariaceous (ver-ö-kā-ri-ā′shius), a. In bot., of or belonging to the genus Verrucaria or the family Verrucariaceæ.

verrucariine (ver-ö-kā′ri-in), a. [< Verrucaria + -ine[1].] In bot., resembling the genus Verrucaria or the family Verrucariaceæ, or having their characters.

verrucarioid (ver-ö-kā′ri-oid), a. [< Verrucaria + -oid.] In bot., same as verrucariine.

Verrucidæ (ve-rö′si-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Verruca, 4, + -idæ.] A family of sessile thoracic Cirripedia, characterized by the absence of a peduncle and the lack of symmetry of the shell, the scuta and terga being deprived of depressor muscles, movable on one side only, on the other united with the rostrum and carina. Verruca is the only genus, with few recent species, but others are found fossil down to the Chalk formation.

verruciform (ve-rö′si-fôrm), a. [< L. verruca, a wart, + forma, form.] Warty; resembling a wart in appearance. Also verrucæform.

verrucose (ver′ö-kōs), a. [< L. verrucosus: see verrucous.] Same as verrucous.

verrucous (ver′ö-kus), a. [= F. verruqueux, < L. verrucosus, full of warts, < verruca, a wart: see verruca.] Warty; studded with verruciform elevations or tubercles.

verruculose (ve-rö′kū-lōs), a. [< L. verrucula, a little eminence, a little wart (dim. of verruca, a wart), + -ose.] Minutely verrucose; covered with small warts or wart-like elevations.

verrugas (ve-rö′gäs), n. pl. [< Sp. verrugas, pl. of verruga, < L. verruca, a wart.] A specific disease, often fatal, occurring in Peru; frambœsia. A prominent characteristic is the appearance of warty growths on the skin. Also used in the singular. See yaws.

verrulet, n. An obsolete form of ferrule[2].

verry (ver′i), a. In her., same as vairé.

versability (vėr-sa-bil′i-ti), n. [< versable + -ity.] The state or quality of being versable; aptness to be turned round.

Now the use of the Auxiliaries is at once to set the soul a-going by herself upon the materials, as they are brought her, and, by the versability of this great engine, round which they are twisted, to open new tracts of inquiry, and make every idea engender millions.
Sterne, Tristram Shandy, v. 42.

versable (vėr′sa-bl), a. [< L. versabilis, movable, changeable, < versare, turn or whirl about: see versant.] Capable of being turned. Blount, 1670.

versableness (vėr′sa-bl-nes), n. The character or state of being versable; versability.

versal† (vėr′sal), a. [Abbr. of universal. Cf. varsal.] Universal; whole.

She looks as pale as any clout in the versal world.
Shak., R. and J., ii. 4. 219.

Some, for brevity,
Have cast the versal world's nativity.
S. Butler, Hudibras, II. iii. 930.

versant (vėr′sant), a. and n. [< F. versant, < L. versan(t-)s, ppr. of versare, turn or whirl about: see verse[1], v.] I. a. 1. Familiar; conversant; versed.

I, with great pains and difficulty, got the whole book of the Canticles translated into each of these languages, by priests esteemed the most versant in the language of each nation. Bruce, Source of the Nile, I. 404.

The Bishop of London is . . . thoroughly versant in ecclesiastical law.
Sydney Smith, First Letter to Archdeacon Singleton. [(Davies.)

2. In her., carrying the wings erect and open. It is generally held to be the same as elevated and pursuant, but seems to refer especially to a display of the under surface of the wings.

II. n. All that part of a country which slopes or inclines in one direction; the general lie or slope of surface; aspect.

★versatile (vėr′sa-til), a. [< F. versatile = Sp. versátil = Pg. versatil = It. versatile, < L. versatilis, revolving, movable, versatile, < versare, turn: see verse[1], v.] 1. Capable of being moved or turned round: as, a versatile spindle.

At ye Royall Society Sr Wm Petty propos'd divers things for the improvement of shipping: a versatile keele that should be on hinges. Evelyn, Diary, Nov. 20, 1661.

He had a versatile timber house built in Mr. Hart's garden (opposite to St. James's parke) to try the experiment. He would turne it to the sun, and sit towards it.
Aubrey, Lives (James Harrington).

Versatile and sharp-piercing, like a screw.
W. Harte, Eulogies.

2. Changeable; variable; unsteady; inconstant.

Those versatile representations in the neck of a dove.
Glanville.

3. Turning with ease from one thing to another; readily applying one's self to a new task, or to various subjects; many-sided: as, a versatile writer; a versatile actor.

An adventurer of versatile parts, sharper, coiner, false witness, sham bail, dancing-master, buffoon, poet, comedian. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vii.

Conspicuous among the youths of high promise . . . was the quick and versatile Montague.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xx.

The versatile mind, ever ready to turn its attention in a new and unexplored quarter.
J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 97.

4. In bot., swinging or turning freely on a support: especially noting an anther fixed by the middle on the apex of the filament, and swinging freely to and fro. See cuts under anther and lily.—5. In ornith., specifically, reversible: noting any toe of a bird which may be turned either forward or backward.

It is advantageous to a bird of prey to be able to spread the toes as widely as possible, that the talons may seize the prey like a set of grappling irons; and accordingly the toes are widely divergent from each other, the outer one in the owls and a few hawks being quite versatile.
Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 130.

6. In entom., moving freely up and down or laterally: as, versatile antennæ.—Versatile dementia, a form of dementia in which the patient is talkative and restless, often with a tendency to destroy, without reason, any objects within his reach.—Versatile head, in entom., a head that can be freely moved in every direction.

versatilely (vėr′sa-til-li), adv. In a versatile manner.

versatileness (vėr′sa-til-nes), n. The state or quality of being versatile; versatility.

versatility (vėr-sa-til′i-ti), n. [< F. versatilité = Sp. versatilidad = Pg. versatilidade = It. versatilità; as versatile + -ity.] 1. The state or character of being changeable or fickle; variableness.

The evils of inconstancy and versatility, ten thousand times worse than those of obstinacy and the blindest prejudice. Burke, Rev. in France.

2. The faculty of easily turning one's mind to new tasks or subjects; facility in taking up various pursuits or lines of thought or action; versatileness: as, the versatility of genius.

I do not mean the force alone,
The grace and versatility of the man.
Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

3. Specifically, in ornith., capability of turning either backward or forward, as a toe; the versatile movement of such a digit.

versation (vėr-sā′shon), n. A turning or winding. Blount, 1670.

Verschoorist (ver′skör-ist), n. [< Verschoor (see def.) + -ist.] One of a minor sect in the Netherlands in the seventeenth century, followers of one Verschoor. They are also called Hebraists, because of their application to the study of Hebrew.

vers de société (vers dė sō-sē-ā-tā′). [F.] Same as society verse (which see, under society).

verse[1]† (vėrs), v. t. [< OF. verser, F. verser = Sp. Who, versing in his mind this thought, can keep his cheeks dry? Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 344.

★verse[2] (vėrs), n. [< ME. vers, partly, and in the early form fers wholly, < AS. fers, partly < OF. (and F.) vers = Sp. Pg. It. verso = D. G. Sw. Dan. vers, < L. versus (pl. versus), also vorsus, a furrow, a line, row, in particular a line of writing, and in poetry a verse, lit. a turning, turn (hence a turn at the end of a furrow, etc.), < vertere, pp. versus, turn: see verse[1]. Hence verse[2], v., versicle, versify, etc.] 1. In pros.: (a) A succession of feet (colon or period) written or printed in one line; a line: as, a poem of three hundred verses; hence, a type of metrical composition, as represented by a metrical line; a meter. A verse may be catalectic, dimeter, trimeter, iambic, dactylic, rimed, unrimed, alliterative, etc.

He made of ryme ten vers or twelve.
Chaucer, Death of Blanche, l. 463.

They . . . thought themselues no small fooles, when they could make their verses goe all in ryme as did the schooles of Salerne. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 9.

It does not follow that, because a man is hanged for his faith, he is able to write good verses.
Lowell, Study Windows, p. 295.

(b) A type of metrical composition, represented by a group of lines; a kind of stanza: as, Spencerian verse; hence, a stanza: as, the first verse of a (rimed) hymn.

Now, good Cesario, but that piece of song . . .
Come, but one verse. Shak., T. N., ii. 4. 7.

A young lady proceeded to entertain the company with a ballad in four verses. Dickens, Oliver Twist, xxvi.

A stanza—often called a verse in the common speech of the present day—may be a group of two, three, or any number of lines. S. Lanier, Sci. of Eng. Verse, p. 239.

(c) A specimen of metrical composition; a piece of poetry; a poem. [Rare.]

This verse be thine, my friend. Pope, Epistle to Jervas.

(d) Metrical composition in general; versification; hence, poetical composition; poetry, especially as involving metrical form: opposed to prose.

To write, to th' honour of my Maker dread,
Verse that a Virgine without blush may read.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 2.

Who says in verse what others say in prose.
Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. i. 202.

Poets, like painters, their machinery claim,
And verse bestows the varnish and the frame.
O. W. Holmes, Poetry.

2. (a) A succession of words written in one line; hence, a sentence, or part of a sentence, written, or fitted to be written, as one line; a stich or stichos. It was a custom in ancient times to write prosaic as well as metrical books in lines of average length. (See colometry, stichometry.) This custom was continued especially in writing the poetical books of the Bible, which, though not metrical in form, are composed in balanced clauses, and in liturgical forms taken from or similar to these. Hence—(b) In liturgics, a sentence, or part of a sentence, usually from the Scriptures, especially from the Book of Psalms, said alternately by an officiant or leader and the choir or people; specifically, the sentence, clause, or phrase said by the officiant or leader, as distinguished from the response of the choir or congregation; a versicle. In the hour-offices a verse is especially a sentence following the responsory after a lesson. In the gradual the second sentence is called a verse, and also that following the alleluia. Also versus. (c) In church music, a passage or movement for a single voice or for soloists, as contrasted with chorus; also, a soloist who sings such a passage. (d) A short division of a chapter in any book of Scripture, usually forming one sentence, or part of a long sentence or period. The present division of verses in the Old Testament is inherited, with modifications, from the masoretic division of verses (pesūqīm), and has been used in Latin and other versions since 1528. The present division of verses in the New Testament was made by Robert Stephanus, on a horseback journey from Paris to Lyons, in an edition published in 1551. In English versions the verses were first marked in the Geneva Bible of 1560. (e) A similar division in any book.—Adonic, Alcaic, Alcmanian verse. See the adjectives.—Blank verse, unrimed verse; particularly, that form of unrimed heroic verse which is commonly employed in English dramatic and epic poetry. It was introduced by the Earl of Surrey (d. 1547), in his translation of the second and fourth books of the Æneid. It was first employed in the drama in Sackville and Norton's tragedy of "Ferrex and Porrex," which was printed in 1565; but it was not till Marlowe adopted it in his play of "Tamburlaine the Great" that it became the form regularly employed in the metrical drama, which it has since with only occasional intervals remained. After Milton's use of it in "Paradise Lost" it was widely extended to many other classes of composition.—Elegiac verse. See elegiac, 1.—Fescennine verses. See Fescennine.—Heroic, Hipponactean, long, Saturnian, serpentine, society, etc., verse. See the qualifying words.—To cap verses. See cap[1].—Verse Lyon†. See the quotation.

Another of their pretie inuentions was to make a verse of such wordes as by their nature and manner of construction and situation might be turned backward word by word, and make another perfit verse, but of quite contrary sence, as the gibing monks that wrote of Pope Alexander these two verses.

Laus tua non tua fraus, virtus non copia rerum, Scandere te faciunt hoc decus eximium.

Which if ye will turne backward they make two other good verses, but of contrary sence; thus,

Eximium decus hoc faciunt te scandere, rerum
Copia, non virtus, fraus tua non tua laus.

And they called it Verse Lyon.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 11.

verse[2] (vėrs), v. [< verse[2], n.] I. trans. To relate or express in verse; turn into verse or rime.

Playing on pipes of corn, and versing love.
Shak., M. N. D., ii. 1. 67.

He fringed its sober grey with poet-bays,
And versed the Psalms of David to the air
Of Yankee-Doodle, for Thanksgiving-days.
Halleck.

II. intrans. To make verses.

It is not riming and versing that maketh a Poet, no more then a long gowne maketh an Aduocate.
Sir P. Sidney, Apol. for Poetrie (ed. Arber), p. 29.

versé (ver-sā′), a. [F., pp. of verser, turn: see verse[1].] In her., reversed or turned in a direction unusual to the bearing in question. Also renverse.

verse-anthem (vėrs′an″them), n. In Eng. church music, an anthem for soloists as contrasted with a full anthem, which is for a chorus. The term is also applied to an anthem that begins with a passage for solo voices.

versed (vėrst), a. [< verse[1] + -ed[2], after F. versé. Cf. versant, conversant.] 1. Conversant or acquainted; practised; skilled: with in.

They were . . . very well versed in the politer parts of learning, and had travelled into the most refined nations of Europe. Addison, Ancient Medals, i.

He is admirably well versed in screws, springs, and hinges, and deeply read in knives, combs, or scissors, buttons, or buckles. Steele, Tatler, No. 142.

He seemed to be a man more than ordinarily versed in the use of astronomical instruments.
Bruce, Source of the Nile, I. 255.

Versed in all the arts which win the confidence and affection of youth. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

2. Turned; turned over.—Versed sine, supplemental versed sine. See sine[2].

verselet (vėrs′let), n. [< verse[2] + -let.] A little verse: used in contempt.

Moreover, he wrote weak little verselets, like very-much-diluted Wordsworth, abounding in passages quotable for Academy pictures of bread-and-butter children.
E. Yates, Broken to Harness, xxi.

verse-maker (vėrs′mā″kėr), n. One who writes verses; a rimer. Boswell.

verse-making (vėrs′mā″king), n. The act or process of making verses; riming.

He had considerable readiness, too, in verse-making.
Athenæum, No. 3245, p. 17.

verseman (vėrs′man), n.; pl. versemen (-men). [< verse[2] + man.] A writer of verses: used humorously or in contempt.

The God of us Verse-men (you know, Child), the sun.
Prior, Better Answer to Cloe Jealous.

I'll join St. Blaise (a verseman fit,
More fit than I, once did it).
F. Locker, The Jester's Moral.

verse-monger (vėrs′mung″gėr), n. A maker of verses; a rimer; a poetaster.

verse-mongering (vėrs′mung″gėr-ing), n. Verse-writing; especially, the making of poor verses.

The contemporary verse-mongering south of the Tweed.
Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 126.

verser[1]† (vėr′sėr), n. [Appar. < verse[1] + -er[1].] One who tricks or cheats at cards; a sharper.

And so was faine to liue among the wicked, sometimes a stander for the padder [the stander was the sentinel to the padder or footpad], sometimes a verser for the conycacher [the coney or rabbit was the dupe, the coney-catcher the sharper who enticed the coney to be fleeced by the verser or card-sharper].
Ribton-Turner, Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 583.

verser[2] (vėr′sėr), n. [< verse[2] + -er[1].] A maker of verses; a versifier; a poet or a poetaster.

Though she have a better verser got (Or Poet in the court-account) than I.
B. Jonson, The Forest, xii.

He [Ben Jonson] thought not Bartas a Poet, but a Verser, because he wrote not Fiction.
Drummond, Conv. of Ben Jonson (Works, ed. 1711, p. 224).

verse-service (vėrs′sėr″vis), n. In Eng. church music, a choral service for solo voices. Compare verse-anthem.

verset (vėr′set), n. [< F. verset, dim. of vers, verse: see verse[2].] 1†. A verse, as of Scripture; a versicle.

They beare an equall part with Priest in many places, and have their cues and versets as well as he.
Milton, On Def. of Humb. Remonst.

2. In music, a short piece of organ-music suitable for use as an interlude or short prelude in a church service.

verse-tale (vėrs′tāl), n. A tale written or told in verse.

Many of the verse-tales are bright and spirited, and even pathos and melancholy are tempered by a certain quiet—sometimes satirical—humour.
The Academy, Oct. 12, 1889, p. 232.

versicle (vėr′si-kl), n. [< L. versiculus, a little verse, dim. of versus, a verse: see verse[2].] A little verse; specifically, in liturgics, one of a succession of short verses said or sung alternately by the officiant and choir or people; especially, the verse said by the officiant or leader as distinguished from the response (℟) of the choir or congregation. See verse, 2 (b). The name of the versicles is sometimes given distinctively to the versicles and responses (preces) after the creed at morning and evening prayer in the Anglican Church. The liturgical sign of the versicle, used in prayer-books, is ℣.

Doe it for thy name, Doe it for thy goodnesse, for thy couenant, thy law, thy glory, &c., in seuerall versicles.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 198.

The Gloria Patri was composed by the Nicene Council, the latter versicle by St. Jerome.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 255.

versicolor, versicolour (vėr′si-kul-or), a. [< L. versicolor, versicolorus, that changes its color, < versare, change (see verse[1]), + color: see color.] 1. Having several different colors; party-colored; variegated in color.

Chains, girdles, rings, versicolour ribands.
Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 478.

2. Changeable in color, as the chameleon; glancing different hues or tints in different lights; iridescent; sheeny. Also versicolorate. Also verse-colored, versicolored, versicolorous.

versicolorate (vėr-si-kul′or-āt), a. [< versicolor + -ate[1].] In entom., same as versicolor, 2.

versicolored (vėr′si-kul-ord), a. [< versicolor + -ed[2].] Same as versicolor: as, versicolored plumage; "a versicolored cloak," Landor.

versicolorous (vėr-si-kul′or-us), a. [< versicolor + -ous.] Same as versicolor.

versicular (vėr-sik′ū-lär), a. [< L. versiculus, dim. of versus, verse (see versicle).] Pertaining to verses; designating distinct divisions of a writing: as, a versicular division.

versification (vėr″si-fi-kā′shon), n. [< F. versification = Sp. versificación = Pg. versificação = It. versificazione, < L. versificatio(n-), < versificare, versify: see versify.] The act, art, or practice of composing poetic verse; the construction or measure of verse or poetry; metrical composition.

Donne alone . . . had your talent; but was not happy enough to arrive at your versification.
Dryden, Essay on Satire.

Bad versification alone will certainly degrade and render disgustful the sublimest sentiments.
Goldsmith, Poetry Distinguished from Other Writing.

The theory that versification is not an indispensable requisite of a poem seems to have become nearly obsolete in our time. Encyc. Brit., XIX. 259.

versificator (vėr′si-fi-kā-tor), n. [< F. versificateur = Sp. Pg. versificador = It. versificatore, < L. versificator, < versificare, versify: see versify.] A versifier. [Rare.]

I must farther add that Statius, the best versificator next to Virgil, knew not how to design after him, though he had the model in his eye. Dryden, Essay on Satire.

Alliteration and epithets, which with mechanical versificators are a mere artifice, . . . charm by their consonance when they rise out of the emotions of the true poet. I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., II. 128.

versificatrix (vėr′si-fi-kā-triks), n. [< L. as if versificatrix*, fem. of versificator: see versificator.] A woman who makes verses. [Rare.]

In 1784 Beattie, writing of Hannah More, says that Johnson "told me, with great solemnity, that she was 'the most powerful versificatrix' in the English language."
Athenæum, No. 3244, p. 894.

versifier (vėr′si-fī-ėr), n. [< versify + -er[1].] 1. One who versifies; one who makes verses; a poet.

Ther is a versifiour seith that the ydel man excuseth hym in wynter bycause of the grete coold and in somer by enchesoun of the heete. Chaucer, Tale of Melibeus.

There haue beene many most excellent Poets that neuer versified, and now swarme many versifiers that neede neuer aunswere to the name of Poets.
Sir P. Sidney, Apol. for Poetrie (ed. Arber), p. 28.

2. One who expresses in verse the ideas of another; one who turns prose into verse; a maker of a metrical paraphrase: as, a versifier of the Psalms.

versiform (vėr′si-fôrm), a. [< LL. versiformis, changeable, < L. versus, in lit. sense 'turning,' + forma, form.] Varied or varying in form.

versify (vėr′si-fī), v.; pret. and pp. versified, ppr. versifying. [< F. versifier = Sp. Pg. versificar = It. versificare, < L. versificare, put into verse, versify, < versus, verse, + facere, make, do (see -fy).] I. trans. 1. To turn into verse; make a metrical paraphrase of: as, to versify the Psalms.

The 30th Psalm was the first which Luther versified; then the 12th, 46th, 14th, 53rd, 67th, 124th, and 128th, which last Huss had done before, and it was only modernised by Luther. Burney, Hist. Music, III. 35, note.

Our fair one . . . bade us versify
The legend. Whittier, Bridal of Pennacook.

2. To relate or describe in verse; treat as the subject of verse.

I versify the truth. Daniel, Civil Wars, i.

A lady loses her muff, her fan, or her lap-dog, and so the silly poet runs home to versify the disaster.
Goldsmith, Vicar, xvii.

II. intrans. To make verses.

I receyved your letter, sente me laste weeke; whereby I perceive you otherwhiles continue your old exercise of Versifying in Englishe. Spenser, To Gabriel Harvey.

In versifying he was attempting an art which he had never learned, and for which he had no aptitude.
Southey, Bunyan, p. 40.

versing (vėr′sing), n. [Verbal n. of verse[2], v.] The act of writing verse.

version (vėr′shon), n. [< F. version = Sp. versión = Pg. versão = It. versione, < ML. versio(n-), a turning, translation, < L. vertere, pp. versus, turn, translate: see verse[1].] 1†. A turning round or about; change of direction.

The first was called the strophe, from the version or circular motion of the singers in that stanza from the right hand to the left. Congreve, On the Pindaric Ode.

What kind of comet, for magnitude, colour, version of the beams, placing in the region of heaven, or lasting, produceth what kind of effects.
Bacon, Vicissitudes of Things (ed. 1887).

2. A change or transformation; conversion.

The version of air into water. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 27.

3. The act of translating, or rendering from one language into another. [Rare.]—4. A translation; that which is rendered from another language. A list of versions of the Bible will be found under the word Bible.

I received the Manuscript you sent me, and, being a little curious to compare it with the Original, I find the Version to be very exact and faithful.
Howell, Letters, I. vi. 27.

Better a dinner of herbs and a pure conscience than the stalled ox and infamy is my version.
Sydney Smith, in Lady Holland, iv.

5. A statement, account, or description of incidents or proceedings from some particular point of view: as, the other party's version of the affair.—6. A school exercise consisting of a translation from one language, generally one's own, into another.—7. In obstet., a manipulation whereby a malposition of the child is rectified, during delivery, by bringing the head or the feet into the line of the axis of the parturient canal; turning. According as the feet or the head may be brought down, the operation is called podalic or cephalic version. Pelvic version is that which converts a malpresentation into a breech-presentation. Version is called external when it is effected by external manipulation only, internal when it is performed by the hand within the parturient canal, and bimanual or bipolar when one hand acting directly upon the child in the uterus is aided by the other placed upon the abdominal wall.

8. In mathematical physics, the measure of the direction and magnitude of the rotation about a neighboring point produced by any vector function distributed through space. Thus, if the vector function is the velocity of a fluid at the different points of space, its curl or version is the rotation of that fluid at any point where its motion is rotational. The advantage of the word version over rotation is that it is applicable to cases where there is no motion: as, for example, to a stress.—Italic version of the Bible. See Italic.—Revised version (sometimes called the revision of the authorized version, or the new revision, or the revision simply), a revision of the authorized or King James version of the Bible, executed by two companies of scholars, one working on the Old Testament, the other on the New Testament, 1870–84. The work was originated by the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury, England, in 1870; subsequently the coöperation of American scholars of different Protestant evangelical denominations was invited; and the work was accomplished by the two international committees, on the basis of the King James version, the resolutions of the Convocation specifically providing that "we do not contemplate any new translation of the Bible, or any alteration of the language, except where, in the judgment of the most competent scholars, such change is necessary." The work of revising the New Testament was completed in November, 1880; that of the Old Testament in July, 1884. Abbreviated R. V., Rev. Ver.—Spontaneous version, in obstet., the rectification of a malpresentation by the action of the uterine muscles alone, without the interference of the accoucheur.—Syn. 4. See translation.

versional (vėr'shọn-ạl), a. [< version + -al.] Of or pertaining to a version or translation.

All the suggestions for emendations [of the Bible], whether textual or versional.
The Independent (New York), March 23, 1871.

versionist (vėr'shọn-ist), n. [< version + -ist.] One who makes a version; a translator; also, one who favors a certain version or translation. Gent. Mag.

verso (vėr'sō), n. [< L. verso, abl. of versus, turned, pp. of vertere, turn: see verse[1].] The reverse, back, or other side of some object. Specifically—(a) Of a coin or medal, the reverse: opposed to obverse. (b) Of a manuscript or print, the second or any succeeding left-hand page; a page of even number: opposed to recto, or one of uneven number: as, verso of title, ★the back of the title-page of a book.

versor (vėr'sọr), n. [NL., < L. vertere, pp. versus, turn: see verse[1].] A particular kind of quaternion; an operator which, applied to a vector lying in a plane related in a certain way to the versor, turns the vector through an angle without altering its modulus, tensor, or length. Every quaternion is a product, in one way only, of a tensor and a versor, and that versor is called the versor of the quaternion, and is represented by a capital U written before the symbol of the quaternion.

versorium (vėr-sō'ri-um), n. A magnetic needle delicately mounted so as to move freely in a horizontal plane: so called by Gilbert. Encyc. Brit., XV. 220.

verst (verst), n. [Also sometimes werst (after G.); = F. verste, < Russ. versta, a verst, also a verst-post, equality, age; perhaps orig. 'turn,' hence a distance, a space, for vertta*, < Russ. vertiti (Slav. √ vert), turn, = L. vertere, turn: see verse[1].] A Russian measure of length, containing 3,500 English feet, or very nearly two thirds of an English mile, and somewhat more than a kilometer.

versual (vėr'sụ-ạl), a. [< L. versus, a verse, + -al.] Of the character of a verse; pertaining to verses or short paragraphs, generally of one sentence or clause: as, the versual divisions of the Bible: correlated with capital, sectional, pausal, parenthetical, punctual, literal, etc. W. Smith's Bible Dict.

versus (vėr'sus), prep. [< L. versus, toward, against, pp. of vertere, turn: see verse[1].] Against: used chiefly in legal phraseology: as, John Doe versus Richard Roe. Abbreviated v., vs.

versute (vėr-sūt'), a. [< L. versutus, adroit, versatile, < vertere, pp. versus, turn: see verse[1], and cf. versant.] Crafty; wily.

A person . . . of versute and vertigenous policy.
Bp. Gauden, Tears of the Church, p. 132. (Davies.)

★vert[1] (vėrt), n. [< F. vert, green, < OF. verd, < L. viride, green, green color: see verd.] 1. In Eng. forest law, everything within a forest bearing a green leaf which may serve as a cover for deer, but especially great and thick coverts; also, a power to cut green trees or wood.

Cum furca, fossa, sock, . . . vert, veth, venison.
Charter, Q. Anne, 1707. (Jamieson.)

The Holy Clerk shall have a grant of vert and venison in my woods of Warncliffe. Scott, Ivanhoe, xl.

I was interested in the preservation of the venison and the vert more than the hunters or wood-choppers.
Thoreau, Walden, p. 269.

2. In her., the tincture green. It is represented by diagonal lines from the dexter chief to the sinister base. Abbreviated v.—Netter vert, underwoods.—Over vert or overt vert, trees serving for browse, shelter, and defense; the great forest as distinguished from underwoods.—Special vert, in old Eng. forest law, trees and plants capable of serving as covert for deer, and bearing fruit on which they feed: so called because its destruction was a more serious offense than the destruction of other vert.

Vert.

vert[2] (vėrt), n. [Taken for convert and pervert, with the distinguishing prefix omitted.] One who leaves one church for another; a convert or pervert, according as the action is viewed by members of the church joined or members of the church abandoned: said especially of persons who go from the Church of England to ★the Church of Rome. [Colloq., Eng.]

vert[2] (vėrt), v. i. [< vert[2], n.] To become a "vert"; leave the Church of England for the Roman communion, or vice versa. [Eng.]

vertant (vėr'tant), a. [< L. vertere, turn, turn about, + -ant.] In her., bent in a curved form; flexed or bowed.

verte (vėr'tē), v. [L.; verte, 2d pers. sing. impv. of vertere, turn: see verse[1].] In music, same as volti.—Verte subito. Same as volti subito. Abbreviated v. s.

verteber† (vėr'tē-bėr), n. A vertebra.

vertebra (vėr'tē-brạ), n.; pl. vertebræ (-brē). ★[Formerly in E. form verteber, q. v.; = F. vertèbre = Sp. vértebra = Pg. It. vertebra, < L. vertebra, a joint, a bone of the spine, < vertere, turn, turn about: see verse[1].] 1. In Vertebrata, any bone of the spine; any segment of the backbone. See backbone and spine. Specifically—(a) Broadly, any axial metamere of a vertebrate, whether osseous, cartilaginous, or merely fibrous, including the segments of the skull as well as those of the trunk. (b) Narrowly, one of the usually separate and distinct bones or cartilages of which the spinal column consists, in most cases composed of a centrum or body, with or without ankylosed ribs, and with a neural arch and various other processes. The centrum is the most solid and the axial part of the bone, with which a pair of neurapophyses are sutured (see cuts under cervical and neurocentral), these apophyses forming the pedicels and laminæ of human anatomy, united in a neural spine or spinous process. Each neurapophysis bears a diapophysis, the transverse process of human anatomy, and a prezygapophysis and a postzygapophysis, called in man the superior and inferior oblique or articular processes, by means of which the successive arches are jointed; together with, in many cases, additional processes connected with these (the anapophyses, metapophyses, and parapophyses), the trace of one of which in the lumbar vertebræ of man is known as the mammillary tubercle. (See cuts under atlas, endoskeleton, dorsal, hypapophysis, and lumbar.) Certain other formations on the neurapophyses provide in some cases for the additional interlocking of these arches. (See zygosphene, zygantrum.) The above-named processes are either autogenous or endogenous, or else exogenous, in different cases and in different animals; they are all that ordinary vertebræ present; and all of them may abort, especially in the caudal region, or be disguised, as by ankylosis, in the sacral region. (See cuts under epipleura, sacrarium, and sacrum.) The centrum of certain vertebræ of some animals bears a single median inferior process. (See hypapophysis.) Vertebral centra do not always correspond exactly to neural arches, owing to intercalation of additional bodies (perhaps corresponding to ordinary intervertebral disks), so that a given arch, like most ribs, may articulate with two centra. (See intercentrum, embolomerous, rachitomous.) Bodies of free vertebræ articulate with one another by their faces, usually with the intervention of a pulpy fibrocartilage. According to the shapes of these faces, they are described as amphicœlian, procœlian, opisthocœlian (see these words), and heterocœlian, and also called biconcave, concavo-convex, convexo-concave, and saddle-shaped. Arches of vertebræ are often connected, as in many fishes, with dermal bones. (See interhemal, interneural.) Ordinary vertebræ are conveniently grouped, according to the region they occupy, as cervical, dorsal or thoracic, lumbar, sacral, and caudal or coccygeal, respectively indicated in vertebral formulæ by the letters C, D, L, S, Cd. In man and most mammals this grouping is well marked by the developed or undeveloped condition of the ribs in the three former regions, and by extensive ankyloses in the two latter, as well as by the size, shape, and other characters of the individual bones; but such distinctions fail of application to some vertebrates. Cetaceans and sirenians have no sacrum to separate lumbar from caudal vertebræ; some cetaceans have consolidated cervicals (see cut under ankylosis); birds have extensively ankylosed dorsals and a remarkably complex sacrum (see cuts under sacrarium and sacrum); snakes have vertebræ gently graded in character from head to tail; in fishes the vertebræ are ordinarily grouped as abdominal, which extend from the head as far as the cavity of the belly extends, and caudal, all the rest of the bones, including some special elements (see heterocercal, homocercal, epural, hypural). Such regional variations in the characters of vertebræ also give rise to the terms cervicodorsal, dorsolumbar, lumbosacral, urosacral, etc. Certain vertebræ have individual names, as atlas, axis, odontoid; see also phrases given below. The number of vertebræ varies widely; it is greatest in some reptiles (over 300). Seven cervicals is the rule in mammals, with rare exceptions (see sloth[1]); but there is no constancy, as regards number, in any of the other regions of the spinal column. See skeleton and the cuts there cited, also cuts under atlas, axis, chevron-bone, and zenarthral.

1, rudimentary spinous process; 2, prezygapophyses, or anterior articular processes; 3, postzygapophyses, or posterior articular processes; 5, convex anterior face of centrum or body of the vertebra; 8, its concave posterior surface; 6, 7, transverse processes and rudimentary ribs, or diapophyses and pleurapophyses.

2. In echinoderms, any one of the numerous axial ossicles of the arms of starfishes. See vertebral, a., 5.—Cranial vertebra, any one of the segments of the skull which has been theoretically assumed to be homologous with a vertebra proper, as by Goethe, Carus, Oken, Owen, and others. Three or four such vertebræ have been recognized in the composition of the skull, named as follows, from behind forward: (1) the occipital or epencephalic, nearly or quite coincident with the compound occipital bone, of which the basioccipital is the centrum, the exoccipitals are the neurapophyses, and the supra-occipital is the neural spine (see cuts under Cyclodus, Esox, and skull[1]); (2) the parietal, mesencephalic, or otic, represented mainly by the basisphenoid as centrum, the alisphenoids as neurapophyses, and the parietals as a pair of expansive neural spines, but also including parts of the skull of the ear (see cuts under Balænidæ, parietal, sphenoid, and tympanic); (3) the frontal, prosencephalic, or ophthalmic, represented mainly by the presphenoid as centrum, the orbitosphenoids as neurapophyses, and the frontal or frontals as a single or bifid neural spine (see cuts under craniofacial, Gallinæ, and sphenoid); (4) the nasal, rhinencephalic, or olfactory, based mainly upon the vomer, ethmoid, and nasal bones. Hemal arches of each of these theoretical vertebræ are sought in the facial, hyoidean, and branchial arches. Three of these supposed vertebræ are distinctly recognizable in most skulls as cranial segments; but these segments are exclusive of the capsules of the special senses, and are not regarded as vertebral, since their cartilaginous basis is not metamerically segmented. See skull[1], parachordal, and cuts under chondrocranium, orbit, skull[1], and parasphenoid.—Dorsocervical vertebræ. See dorsocervical.—Epencephalic vertebra. See cranial vertebra.—False vertebra, an ankylosed vertebra, as of the sacrum and coccyx of man: an antiquated phrase in human anatomy.—Frontal vertebra. See cranial vertebra.—Laminæ of a vertebra. See lamina.—Mesencephalic, nasal, occipital, olfactory, ophthalmic, otic, parietal, prosencephalic, rhinencephalic vertebra. See cranial vertebra.—Odontoid vertebra. Same as axis[1], 3 (a).—Spinous process of a vertebra. See spinous.—Toothed vertebra. Same as axis[1], 3 (a).—True vertebra, a free vertebra: an antiquated phrase in human anatomy.—Vertebra dentata. Same as axis[1], 3 (a).—Vertebra prominens, the prominent vertebra; that vertebra whose spinous process is most prominent. In man this is the seventh cervical. See also vertebra in ★the supplement.

vertebral (vėr'tē-brạl), a. and n. [= F. vertébral = Sp. Pg. vertebral = It. vertebrale, < NL. vertebralis, < L. vertebra, a joint, vertebra: see vertebra.] I. a. 1. Of the nature of a vertebra; characteristic of or peculiar to vertebræ: as, vertebral elements or processes; vertebral segmentation.—2. Pertaining or relating to a vertebra or to vertebræ; spinal: as, vertebral arteries, nerves, muscles; a vertebral theory or formula.—3. Composed of vertebræ; axial, as the backbone of any vertebrate; spinal; rachidian: as, the vertebral column.—4. Having vertebræ; backboned; vertebrate: as, a vertebral animal. [Rare.]—5. In Echinodermata, axial: noting the median ossicles of the ray of any starfish, a series of which forms a solid internal axis of any ray or arm, each ossicle consisting of two lateral halves united by a longitudinal suture, and articulated by tenon-and-mortise joints upon their terminal surfaces. See Ophiuridæ, and cuts under Asteriidæ and Astrophyton.

Each of these ossicles (which are sometimes termed vertebral) is surrounded by four plates—one median and antambulacral, two lateral, and one median and superambulacral. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 482.

6. In entom., situated on or noting the median line of the upper surface.—Anterior vertebral vein. See vein.—Vertebral aponeurosis, a fascia separating the muscles belonging to the shoulder and arm from those which support the head and spine, stretched from the spinous processes of the vertebræ to the angles of the ribs, beneath the serratus posticus superior, and continuous with the fascia nuchæ. Also called vertebral fascia.—Vertebral artery, a branch of the subclavian which passes through the vertebrarterial canal to enter the foramen magnum and form with its fellow the basilar artery. It gives off in man posterior meningeal, anterior and posterior spinal, and inferior cerebellar arteries.—Vertebral arthropathy, a form of spinal or tabetic arthropathy accompanied by changes in shape of the vertebræ.—Vertebral border of the scapula, in human anat., that border of the scapula which lies nearest the spinal column. It is morphologically the distal end of the bone. See scapula and shoulder-blade.—Vertebral canal. See canal[1].—Vertebral caries, a tuberculous disease of one or more of the bodies of the vertebræ; Pott's disease of the spine: the cause of angular curvature of the spine.—Vertebral chain, vertebral column. Same as spinal column (which see, under spinal).—Vertebral fascia. Same as vertebral aponeurosis.—Vertebral foramen. See foramen and vertebrarterial.—Vertebral formula, the abbreviated expression of the number of vertebræ in each of the recognized regions of the spinal column. The formula normal to man is C. 7, D. 12, L. 5, S. 5, Cd. 4 = 33.—Vertebral muscles, axial (epaxial, paraxial, or hypaxial) muscles which lie along the trunk in relation with vertebræ or vertebral segments. In the lower vertebrates, whose axial musculature is segmented into numerous myocommata (the flakes of the flesh of fish, for example), such muscles are coincident, to some extent, with vertebræ. In the higher, most of the vertebral muscles extend undivided along several vertebræ, though their segmentation may be traced in their deeper layers or fascicles, as in the so-called fourth and fifth layers of the muscles of the back of man. Those hypaxial muscles which lie under (in man, in front of) the vertebræ are grouped as prevertebral, as the scaleni of the neck and psoas of the loins.—Vertebral ossicle. Same as ambulacral ossicle (which see, under ambulacral). See also vertebra, 2, and vertebral, a., 5.—Vertebral plexus. See plexus.—Vertebral ribs, in man, the two lowest ribs on each side, connected with the vertebræ only; the floating ribs: distinguished from vertebrochondral and from vertebrosternal ribs.—Vertebral vein. See vein.

II. n. 1. A vertebrate. [Rare.]—2. A vertebral artery.

vertebralis (vėr-tē-brā'lis), n.; pl. vertebrales (-lēz). [NL.: see vertebral.] The vertebral artery of any animal.

vertebrally (vėr'tē-bral-i), adv. 1. By, with, or as regards vertebræ: as, segmented vertebrally; vertebrally articulated ribs.—2. At or in a vertebra, and not between two vertebræ: correlated with intervertebrally: as, vertebrally adjusted neural arches.

vertebrarium (vėr-tē-brā'ri-um), n.; pl. vertebraria (-ä). [NL., < L. vertebra, a joint, vertebra: see vertebra.] The vertebræ collectively; the whole spinal column.

vertebrarterial (vėr″tē-brär-tē'ri-al), a. Pertaining to a vertebra and an artery: specifically noting a foramen in the side of a cervical vertebra transmitting the vertebral artery. A vertebrarterial foramen is formed by the partial confluence of a rudimentary cervical rib, or pleurapophysis, with the transverse process proper, or diapophysis, of a cervical vertebra; the series of such foramina constitutes the vertebrarterial canal. This structure is one of the distinguishing characters of a cervical vertebra in man and many other animals. Also vertebro-arterial. See cut under cervical.

Vertebrata (vėr-tē-brā'tä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. vertebratus, jointed, articulated: see vertebrate.] A phylum or prime division of the animal kingdom, containing all those animals which have a backbone or its equivalent; the vertebrates, formerly contrasted with all other animals (Invertebrata), now ranked as one of seven or eight phyla which are severally contrasted with one another. This division was formally recognized in 1788 by Batsch, who united the four Linnean classes then current (Mammalia, Aves, Amphibia, and Pisces) under the German name Knochenthiere; and next in 1797 by Lamarck, who called the same group in French animaux à vertèbres, and contrasted it with his animaux sans vertèbres, whence the New Latin terms Vertebrata and Invertebrata. But this identical classification, with Greek names, is actually as old as Aristotle, whose Ἔναιμα (Enæma), or 'blooded' animals, were the vertebrates, divided, moreover, into four classes exactly corresponding to the modern mammals, birds, reptiles with amphibians, and fishes, and contrasted with his Ἄναιμα (Anæma), or 'bloodless' animals, these being all invertebrates. Vertebrates are the most highly organized metazoans, with permanent distinction of sex, and consequent gamic reproduction without exception. Their essential structural character is the presence of an axon from head to tail, dividing the trunk into an upper neural canal or tube containing the main nervous cord, and an under hemal cavity or cavities containing the principal viscera of digestion, respiration, circulation, and reproduction, together with a sympathetic nervous system. Except in the lowest class of vertebrates (Acrania), the head has a skull and brain (Craniota). The alimentary canal is completely shut off from the body-cavity, and open to the exterior at both ends. Special organs of respiration are confined to this canal, and form in the higher vertebrates lungs and in the lower gills, the latter structures being developed in connection with certain visceral clefts (see slit[1], 5) and arches which are present in embryos of all vertebrates, but which for the most part disappear in those above amphibians. Organs of circulation are present in two main systems—the blood-vascular, consisting of a heart or its equivalent, arteries, veins, and capillaries, and the lymph-vascular, consisting of lymphatic bodies and vessels. These two systems communicate with each other, and the lymphatic with both the mucous and the serous cavities of the body; the blood-vascular system is otherwise closed. The main nervous system is primitively tubular; except in Acrania, it becomes differentiated into a brain and spinal cord, from both of which pairs of nerves ramify in nearly all parts of the body, and effect intricate anastomoses with the sympathetic system. Organs of the special senses are present, with sporadic exceptions, especially of the eye. The organs of reproduction in both sexes are connected with the alimentary canal, except in a few fishes and in all mammals above marsupials. Ova are matured either within or without the body of the female. The embryo or fetus develops from a four-layered germ, whose epiblast is the origin of the cuticle and main nervous axis, whose hypoblast lines the alimentary canal, and whose mesoblast, splitting into somatopleural and splanchnopleural layers, forms a body-cavity and most of the substance of the body. All vertebrates have an endoskeleton and an exoskeleton, the former constituting the main framework of the body, and the latter inclosing it in space. The Vertebrata have been variously classified: (a) Upon physiological considerations, into (1) oviparous, ovoviviparous, and viviparous; (2) cold-blooded and warm-blooded, or Hæmatocrya and Hæmatotherma; (3) those with nucleated and those with non-nucleated blood-cells, or Pyrenæmata and Apyrenæmata. (b) Upon mixed physiological and anatomical grounds, into (1) those with gills and those without them, or Branchiata and Abranchiata; (2) those without amnion and allantois in the embryo, and those with these embryonic organs, respectively the Anamnionata or Anallantoidea, and the Amnionata or Allantoidea. (c) Upon the most general considerations, mainly structural, Vertebrata have been determined to fall most naturally into three subphyla or superclasses, defined alike by various authors under different names. These are (1) fishes and amphibians together; (2) reptiles proper and birds together; (3) mammals alone. These three brigades have become best known under Huxley's names—(1) Ichthyopsida, (2) Sauropsida, (3) Mammalia. They are also called (1) Lyrifera, (2) Quadratifera, (3) Malleifera. The classes into which vertebrates were long directly divided without brigading were originally four: Pisces, fishes; Amphibia, amphibians and reptiles; Aves, birds; Mammalia, beasts. Next there were five, by separation of the second of these divisions into the classes Amphibia and Reptilia proper. Finally, the original class Pisces was dismembered into four classes: Leptocardia or Pharyngobranchii or Cirrostomi, the lancelets or acranial vertebrates alone; Marsipobranchii or Cyclostomi, the monorhine vertebrates, or lampreys and hags; Selachii or Elasmobranchii, the sharks and rays; and Pisces proper, or ordinary fishes. (See fish[1].) None of the divisions of Amphibia, Reptilia, or Mammalia are usually accorded the rank of classes; so that the phylum Vertebrata is now usually taken to consist of the eight classes above noted. After the discovery by Kowalevsky, in 1866, of the possession of a notochord by the embryos of ascidians and by some adults of that group (see urochord, and cut under Appendicularia), the Tunicata, under the name of Urochorda, were added to the Vertebrata, and the larger group thus composed was called Chordata by Balfour. Later the worm-like organisms of the genus Balanoglossus were admitted to the same association, and it has been supposed that some others (as Cephalodiscus and Rhabdopleura) may require to be considered in the same connection. With such extension of the scope of Vertebrata, or rather the merging of that group in a higher one comprising all the chordate animals which agree in possessing a (temporary or permanent) notochord, a dorsal neural axis, and pharyngeal slits, the arrangement of Chordata becomes (1) Hemichorda, the acorn-worms; (2) Urochorda, the tunicates; (3) Cephalochorda, the lancelets or acranial vertebrates; and (4) Vertebrata proper, or ordinary skulled vertebrates.

vertebrate (vėr'tē-brāt), a. and n. [= F. vertébré = Sp. Pg. vertebrado = It. vertebrato, < L. vertebratus, jointed, articulated, vertebrated, < vertebra, joint, vertebra: see vertebra.] I. a. 1. Having vertebræ; characterized by the possession of a spinal column; backboned; in a wider sense, having a notochord, or chorda dorsalis; chordate; specifically, of or pertaining to the Vertebrata. Also vertebrated, and (rarely) vertebral.—2. Same as vertebral: as, a vertebrate theory of the skull. [Rare.]—3. In bot., contracted at intervals, like the vertebral column of animals, there being an articulation at each contraction, as in some leaves.

II. n. A vertebrated animal; any member of the Vertebrata, or, more broadly, of the Chordata: as, ascidians are supposed to be vertebrates.

vertebrate (vėr'tē-brāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. vertebrated, ppr. vertebrating. [< vertebrate, a.] To make a vertebrate of; give a backbone to; hence, figuratively, to give firmness or resolution to. [Rare.]

vertebrated (vėr'tē-brā-ted), a. [< vertebrate + -ed[2].] 1. Same as vertebrate, 1.—2. Jointed, as the arms of starfishes, by means of vertebræ. See vertebra, 2, vertebral, a., 5, and ambulacral ossicles (under ambulacral).

vertebration (vėr-tē-brā'shon), n. [< vertebrate + -ion.] The formation of vertebræ; division into segments resembling those of the vertebral column.

vertebre† (vėr'tē-bėr), n. A vertebra.

vertebro-arterial (vėr″tē-brō-är-tē'ri-al), a. Same as vertebrarterial.

vertebrochondral (vėr″tē-brō-kon'dral), a. Connected, as a rib, with vertebræ at one end and at the other with costal cartilages of other ribs; vertebrocostal, but not vertebrosternal.—Vertebrochondral ribs, the uppermost three of the false ribs of each side of man, which are connected in front with one another by their costal cartilages.

vertebrocostal (vėr″tē-brō-kos'tal), a. 1. Same as costovertebral: as, the vertebrocostal articulation of the head of a rib with the body or centrum of a vertebra. Compare costotransverse.—2. Same as vertebrochondral: as, man has three pairs of vertebrocostal ribs.

vertebro-iliac (vėr″tē-brō-il'i-ak), a. Common to vertebræ and to the ilium; specifically, iliolumbar: applied to the connection or relation of the ilium to lumbar vertebræ.

Vertebrosa (vėr-tē-brō'sä), n. pl. Same as Vertebrata.

vertebrosacral (vėr″tē-brō-sā'kral), a. Of or pertaining to sacral and antecedent vertebræ; lumbosacral; sacrolumbar.—Vertebrosacral angle, in human anat., the lumbosacral eminence; the promontory of the sacrum.

vertebrosternal (vėr″tē-brō-stėr'nal), a. Extending, as a rib, from the backbone to the breast-bone; connecting a vertebra or vertebræ with a sterneber or sternebers.—Vertebrosternal ribs, the true ribs; those ribs which are severally connected with the sternum through the intervention of their respective costal cartilages.

★vertex (vėr'teks), n.; pl. vertexes or vertices (-tek-sez, -ti-sēz). [= F. vertex (in zoöl.) = Sp. Pg. It. vertice, < L. vertex, vortex (-tic-), a whirl, whirlpool, eddy, vortex, the top or crown of the head, the head, the pole of the heavens, the highest point, peak, summit, lit. 'turn' or 'turning-point,' < vertere, vortere, turn, turn about: see verse[1], and cf. vertebra, etc. The L. vertex and vortex are diff. forms of the same word, though ancient grammarians attempted to distinguish them; from the form vortex is E. vortex, q. v.] 1. The highest or principal point; apex; top; crown; summit. Specifically—(a) In anat. and zoöl., the crown or top of the head; of man, the dome, vault, or arch of the head or skull, between the forehead and hindhead. See calvarium, sinciput, and cuts under bird[1], brain, cranium, and skull[1]. (b) The summit or top of a hill, or the like. Derham. (c) The point of the heavens directly overhead; the zenith.

2. In math., a point of a figure most distant from the center.—Principal vertex of a conic section, a point where the transverse axis meets the curve.—Vertex of an angle, the point whence the two rays proceed which form the angle.—Vertex presentation, vertex delivery. See presentation[1], 6.

★vertical (vėr'ti-kal), a. and n. [< F. vertical = Sp. Pg. vertical = It. verticale, < ML. verticalis,* < L. vertex (-tic-), the highest point, vertex: see vertex. Cf. vortical.] I. a. 1. Of or relating to the vertex; situated at the vertex, apex, or highest point; placed in the zenith, or point in the heavens directly overhead; figuratively, occupying the highest place.

> I behold him [Essex] in his high-noon, when he . . . was vertical in the esteem of the soldiery.
> Fuller, Worthies, Herefordshire, II. 77.

> If zeal . . . be short, sudden, and transient, . . . it is to be suspected for passion and frowardness, rather than the vertical point of love. Jer. Taylor, Holy Living, iv. 3.

> 'Tis raging noon; and, vertical, the sun
> Darts on the head direct his forceful rays.
> Thomson, Summer, l. 432.

2. Specifically, being in a position or direction perpendicular to the plane of the horizon; upright; plumb. A vertical line or plane is one in which, if produced, the vertex or zenith lies. The word is applied to a number of tools and machines, to indicate the position in which they are placed or used: as, the vertical mill; a vertical planer.

3. In med., of or relating to the vertex, or crown of the head.—4. In zoöl. and anat.: (a) Pertaining to or placed on the vertex, or crown of the head; sincipital; coronal: as, vertical stemmata of an insect; vertical eyes of a fish; the vertical crest of some birds is horizontal when not erected. (b) Placed or directed upward or downward; upright or downright; being at right angles with an (actual or assumed) horizon. Vertical in this sense is either (1) intrinsic, with reference to an actual or assumed horizontal plane of the body itself, as to the dorsal or ventral surface of most animals, or (2) extrinsic, with reference to the earth's horizon; in the latter case it is the same as def. 2.—Median vertical plane, in any vertebrate, the meson.—Vertical angles, in geom., the opposite angles made by two lines which intersect one another. Thus, if the straight lines AB and CD intersect one another in the point E, the opposite angles AEC and DEB are vertical angles, as are also AED and CEB.—Vertical anthers, anthers attached by the base and as erect as the filaments.—Vertical axis of a crystal, that axis which stands erect when the crystal is placed in its proper position: in the orthometric systems it is at right angles to the basal plane.—Vertical circle. (a) Same as azimuth circle (which see, under azimuth). (b) See circle.—Vertical composition, musical composition in which the chief attention is put on the harmonic structure of the successive chords, as contrasted with horizontal composition, in which it is put on the melodic structure of the several voice-parts.—Vertical dial, drill, engine. See the nouns.—Vertical escapement, an old escapement in watches, in which the plane of revolution of the scape-wheel was vertical.—Vertical fins, in ichth., the median unpaired fins, extended in the plane of the meson. They are the dorsal, anal, and caudal, as distinguished from the lateral and paired pectorals and ventrals. In most fishes, in ordinary attitudes, these fins are actually perpendicular to the horizon; in the flatfishes they are usually horizontal.—Vertical fire. See fire, 13.—Vertical fissure, in anat., same as precentral sulcus (which see, under precentral).—Vertical force at any point of the earth's surface, in magnetism, the vertical component of the total magnetic attraction of the earth.—Vertical index, in craniom., the ratio of the greatest height of the skull to its greatest length. See craniometry.—Vertical leaves, in bot., leaves with the blade in a perpendicular plane, so that neither of the surfaces can be called upper or under, as in the eucalypts of Australia, the compass-plants, etc.—Vertical line, any line perpendicular or at right angles to the plane of the horizon. In conics, a vertical line is a straight line drawn on the vertical plane which passes through the vertex of the cone.—Vertical margin, in entom., the posterior boundary of the vertex, where it adjoins the occiput, forming with it either a sharp or a rounded edge.—Vertical orbit, in entom., that part of the orbit or border of the compound eye which adjoins the vertex.—Vertical plane. (a) A plane perpendicular to the plane of the horizon. (b) In conic sections, a plane passing through the vertex of a cone and through its axis. (c) In persp., a plane perpendicular to the geometrical plane, passing through the eye, and cutting the perspective plane at right angles.—Vertical section. See orthograph.—Vertical slur, in musical notation, a name sometimes loosely given to the curved or wavy sign for the arpeggio rendering of a chord.—Vertical steam-boiler, steam-engine, triangle, etc. See the nouns.—Vertical sulcus, in anat., same as precentral sulcus (which see, under precentral).

II. n. A vertical circle, plane, or line.—Prime vertical, in astron. See prime.—Seismic vertical. See seismic.

verticality (vėr-ti-kal'i-ti), n. [= F. verticalité; as vertical + -ity.] The state of being vertical; verticalness. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vi. 3.

vertically (vėr'ti-kal-i), adv. In a vertical manner, position, or direction; in a line or plane passing through the zenith; also, upward toward or downward from the zenith.

Butterflies, when they alight, close their wings vertically, moths expand them horizontally.
G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, 1st ser., II. 144.

The flakes fell softly and vertically through the motionless air, and all the senses were full of languor and repose.
Howells, Venetian Life, iii.

verticalness (vėr'ti-kal-nes), n. The state of being vertical; verticality.

verticel (vėr'ti-sel), n. Same as verticil.

vertices, n. Latin plural of vertex.

verticil (vėr'ti-sil), n. [Also verticel; = F. verticille = Sp. Pg. It. verticillo, < L. verticillus, the whirl of a spindle, dim. of vertex, a whirl: see vertex.] 1. In bot., a whorl: applied to organs, as leaves or flowers, that are disposed in a circle or ring around an axis.—2. In zoöl., a whorl, or circular set of parts radiating from an axis: as, a verticil of hairs, tentacles, or processes.

verticillaster (vėr″ti-si-las'tėr), n. [NL., < L. verticillus, the whirl of a spindle (see verticil), + dim. -aster.] In bot., a form of inflorescence in which the flowers are arranged in a seeming whorl, consisting in fact of a pair of opposite axillary, usually sessile, cymes or clusters, as in many of the Menthaceæ.

verticillastrate (vėr'ti-si-las″trāt), a. [< verticillaster + -ate[1].] In bot., bearing or arranged in verticillasters.

verticillate (vėr-ti-sil'āt), a. [= F. verticillé = Sp. verticilado = Pg. verticillado = It. verticillato, < NL. verticillatus*, < L. verticillus, a whirl: see verticil.] Whorled; disposed in a verticil, as leaves or flowers; having organs so disposed. —Verticillate antennæ, in entom., antennæ whose joints are whorled with verticils of hairs.—Verticillate leaves, in bot., same as stellate leaves (which see, under stellate).

verticillated (vėr'ti-si-lā-ted), a. [< verticillate + -ed[2].] Same as verticillate.

verticillately (vėr'ti-si-lāt-li), adv. In a verticillate manner.

verticillate-pilose (vėr-ti-sil'āt-pī″lōs), a. Pilose or hairy in whorls, as the antennæ of some insects.

verticillation (vėr″ti-si-lā'shọn), n. [< verticillate + -ion.] The formation of a verticil; the presence or existence of verticils; a set of verticils, or one of them; annulation.

In the Diadematidæ the spines are hollow, long, and set with rings or verticillations. Stand. Nat. Hist., I. 167.

verticillus (vėr-ti-sil'us), n.; pl. verticilli (-ī). [NL.: see verticil.] A verticil.

verticity† (vėr-tis'i-ti), n. [< F. verticité = Sp. verticidad = Pg. verticidade; as vertex (vertic-) + -ity.] A tendency to turn; specifically, the directive force of magnetism.

We believe the verticity of the needle, without a certificate from the days of old. Glanville.

Whether then they be globules, or no; or whether they have a verticity about their own centers.
Locke, Human Understanding, IV. ii. 12.

Pole of verticity. See pole[2].

verticle† (vėr'ti-kl), n. [< L. verticula, verticulum, a joint, dim. (cf. vertex, a whirl), < vertere, turn about: see verse[1], and cf. vertebra.] An axis; a hinge. Waterhouse.

Verticordia (vėr-ti-kôr'di-ą), n. [NL., < L. Verticordia, a name of Venus, < vertere, turn, + cor (cord-), heart.] 1. [De Candolle, 1826, so named because closely akin to the myrtle, sacred to Venus.] A genus of plants, family Myrtaceæ and tribe Chamælaucieæ. It is characterized by five or ten calyx-lobes deeply divided into subulate plumose or hair-like segments, and by ten stamens alternate with as many staminodes. The 40 species are all Australian. They are smooth heath-like shrubs with small entire opposite leaves. The white, pink, or yellow flowers are solitary in the upper axils, sometimes forming broad leafy corymbs, or terminal spikes. Some of the species are cultivated under glass, under the name of juniper-myrtle.

2. [S. Wood, 1844.] In conch., the typical genus of Verticordiidæ.

Verticordiidæ (vėr″ti-kôr-dī'i-dē), n. pl. [< Verticordia + -idæ.] A family of dimyarian bivalve mollusks, typified by the genus Verticordia. The animal has the mantle-margins mostly connected, the siphons sessile, and surrounded by a circular fringe and one pair of small branchiæ. The shell is cordiform, nacreous inside, and the ligament is lodged in a subinternal groove, and has an ossicle.

vertiginate (vėr-tij'i-nāt), a. [< LL. vertiginatus, pp. of vertiginare, whirl around, < L. vertigo (-gin-), a whirling: see vertigo.] Turned round; giddy. Coleridge. [Rare.]

Vertiginidæ (vėr-ti-jin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Vertigo (-gin-) + -idæ.] A family of pulmonate gastropods, typified by the genus Vertigo, generally united with Pupidæ or Helicidæ.

vertiginous (vėr-tij'i-nus), a. [= F. vertigineux = Sp. Pg. It. vertiginoso, < L. vertigo (-gin-), a whirling in the head: see vertigo.] 1. Turning round; whirling; rotary: as, a vertiginous motion.

The love of money is a vertiginous pool, sucking all into it to destroy it. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 300.

2. Affected with vertigo; giddy; dizzy. Jer. Taylor, Repentance, iii. § 3.—3. Apt to turn or change; unstable.

"He that robs a church shall be like a wheel," of a vertiginous and unstable estate.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 124.

4. Apt to make one giddy; inducing giddiness: as, a vertiginous height.

The vertiginous disease is not so strong with them that are on the ground as with them that stand on the top of a steeple. Baxter, Self-Denial, Epistle Monitory.

vertiginously (vėr-tij'i-nus-li), adv. In a vertiginous manner; with a whirling or giddiness.

vertiginousness (vėr-tij'i-nus-nes), n. The state or character of being vertiginous; giddiness; a whirling, or sense of whirling; dizziness.

vertigo (vėr-tī'gō, now usually vėr'ti-gō), n. [= F. vertige = Sp. vértigo = Pg. vertigem = It. vertigine, < L. vertigo (-gin-), a turning or whirling round, dizziness, giddiness, < vertere, turn, turn about: see verse[1]. Cf. tiego.] 1. Dizziness; giddiness; a condition in which the individual or the objects around him appear to be whirling about. It is called subjective vertigo when the patient seems to himself to be turning, and objective vertigo when it is the surrounding objects that appear to move.

Our drink shall be prepared gold and amber,
Which we will take until my roof whirl round
With the vertigo. B. Jonson, Volpone, iii. 6.

That old vertigo in his head
Will never leave him till he's dead.
Swift, Death of Dr. Swift.

2. [cap.] [NL.] In conch., a genus of pulmonates, typical of the family Vertiginidæ.—Auditory or aural vertigo, Ménière's disease: an affection in which the prominent symptoms are vertigo, deafness, and ringing in the ears: supposed to be a disease of the labyrinth of the ear.—Essential vertigo, vertigo for which no cause can be discovered.—Ocular vertigo. See ocular.—Paralyzing vertigo, a disease observed in the vicinity of Geneva, Switzerland, manifesting itself in diurnal paroxysms of ptosis, vertigo, paresis of various parts, and severe rachialgia, lasting seldom more than two minutes. It occurs mostly in summer, and affects mainly males who work on farms. Also called Gerlier's disease.

vertu[1]†, n. An old spelling of virtue.

vertu[2], n. See virtu.

vertuet, vertulest. Old spellings of virtue, virtueless.

vertumnal†, a. [Irreg. < L. ver, spring, with term. as in autumnal.] Vernal.

Her [mystical city of peace] breath is sweeter than the new-blown rose; millions of souls lie sucking their life from it; and the smell of her garments is like the smell of Lebanon. Her smiles are more reviving than the vertumnal sunshine. Rev. T. Adams, Works, II. 333.

Vertumnus (vėr-tum'nus), n. [L., the god of the changing year, he who turns or changes himself, < vertere, turn, change, + -umnus, a formative (= Gr. -όμενος) of the ppr. mid. of verbs. Cf. alumnus.] 1. An ancient Roman deity who presided over gardens and orchards, and was worshiped as the god of spring or of the seasons in general.—2. [NL.] In zoöl., a generic name variously applied to certain worms, beetles, and amphipods.

vertuous†, a. An old spelling of virtuous.

veru (ver'ö), n. [L.] A spit.—Veru montanum, an oblong rounded projection on the floor of the prostatic section of the urethra: same as crista urethræ (which see, under crista).

verucous†, a. A bad spelling of verrucous.

Verulamian (ver-ö-lā'mi-an), a. [< Verulam (ML. Verulamium, Verolamium), an ancient British city near the site of St. Albans.] Of or pertaining to St. Albans, or Francis Bacon (1561–1626), Baron Verulam, Viscount St. Albans.

A temper well fitted for the reception of the Verulamian doctrine. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., iii.

veruled (ver'öld), a. [< verule-s + -ed[2].] In her., ringed: noting a hunting-horn or similar bearing when the rings around it are of a different tincture from the rest. Also virolé, viroled.

verules (ver'ölz), n. [Pl. of verule, var. of virole, ferule.] In her., a bearing consisting of several small rings one within another concentrically. Also called vires.

vervain (vėr'vān), n. [Formerly also vervaine, verveine, vervine, vervin; < OF. verveine = Sp. Pg. It. verbena, vervain, < L. verbena, a green bough, etc., one of a class of plants used as cooling remedies, hence later verbena, vervain: see verbena.] One of several weedy plants of the genus Verbena, primarily V. officinalis, widely dispersed in warm and temperate regions in both hemispheres. It is a plant a foot or two high, with spreading wiry branches, and very small flowers in slender racemes. It had sacred associations with the Druids, as indeed among the Romans; it has been worn as an amulet, held to be serviceable to witches and against them, used in love-philters, and credited with virtue against a variety of diseases. In Christian times it became associated with the cross, whence much of its repute. It is also called Juno's-tears, holy-herb, herb-of-grace or herb of the cross, and pigeon's-grass. (See pigeon's-grass.) The plant has a bitterish and astringent taste, and perhaps some slight febrifugal and other virtue, but is replaced by better remedies. In America several other verbenas receive the name, as V. hastata, the blue vervain, a tallish slender plant with small blue flowers, V. stricta, the hoary vervain, a hairy plant with larger purple flowers, and V. urticæfolia, the white or nettle-leafed vervain, with small white flowers.

With reverence place
The vervin on the altar.
B. Jonson, Sejanus, v. 4.

And thou, light vervain too, thou must go after,
Provoking easy souls to mirth and laughter.
Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess, ii. 2.

Bastard or false vervain. See Stachytarpheta.—Stinking vervain. See stink.

vervain-mallow (vėr'vān-mal″ō), n. A species of mallow, Malva Alcea.

verve (vėrv), n. [< F. verve, rapture, animation, spirit, caprice, whim.] Enthusiasm, especially in what pertains to art and literature; spirit; energy.

If he be above Virgil, and is resolved to follow his own verve (as the French call it), the proverb will fall heavily upon him, Who teaches himself has a fool for his master.
Dryden, Ded. of the Æneid.

verveinet, n. An obsolete form of vervain.

verveled (vėr'veld), a. In her., same as varveled.

vervelle (ver-vel'), n. [F.: see varvels.] In medieval armor, a small staple or loop, especially one of those attached to the steel head-piece, through which the lace was passed for attaching the camail.

vervels (vėr'velz), n. pl. Same as varvels.

vervet (vėr'vet), n. A South African monkey, Cercopithecus pygerythrus, or C. lalandi. It is one of the so-called green monkeys, closely allied to the grivet. Vervets are among the monkeys carried about by organ-grinders.

very (ver'i), a. [< ME. very, verri, verray, verrai, veray, verry, verrey, verrei, verre, < OF. verrai, verai, vrai, vray, F. vrai = Pr. verai, true, < LL. as if verācus*, for L. verax (verāc-), truthful, true, < verus (> It. Pg. vero = OF. ver, veir, voir), true, = OIr. fīr = OS. wār = OFries. wer = MD. waer, D. waar = MLG. wār = OHG. MHG. wār (also OHG. wāri, MHG. wære), G. wahr, true, = Goth. wērs, in tuz-wērs, doubtful; cf. OBulg. viera = Russ. viera, faith, belief; prob. ult. connected with L. velle, will, choose, E. will: see will[1], wale[2]. From the L. verus are also ult. E. verily (the adv. of very), veracious, veracity (the abstract noun of veracious, and of very as representing L. verax), verity, aver, and the first element in verify, verisimilar, verdict, etc.] True; real; actual; veritable: now used chiefly in an intensive sense, or to emphasize the identity of a thing mentioned with that which was in mind: as, to destroy his very life; that is the very thing that was lost: in the latter use, often with same: as, the very same fault.

That was the verray Croys assayed; for thei founden 3 Crosses, on of oure Lord and 2 of the 2 Theves.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 78.

This is verry gold of the myn.
Book of Quinte Essence (ed. Furnivall), p. 3.

The very Greekes and Latines themselues tooke pleasure in Riming verses, and vsed it as a rare and gallant thing.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 8.

Whether thou be my very son Esau or not.
Gen. xxvii. 21.

When all else left my cause,
My very adversary took my part.
Beau. and Fl., Honest Man's Fortune, i. 1.

One Lord Jesus Christ, . . . very God of very God.
Nicene Creed, Book of Common Prayer.

We have as very a knave in our company [By-ends] as dwelleth in all these parts. Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress.

Bliss was it in that dawn to be alive,
But to be young was very Heaven!
Wordsworth, Prelude, xi.

[Very is occasionally used in the comparative degree, and more frequently in the superlative.

Thou hast the veriest shrew of all.
Shak., T. of the S., v. 2. 64.

Is there a verier child than I am now?
Donne, Devotions (Works, III. 505).]

In very deed. See deed and indeed.

very (ver'i), adv. [< very, a. The older adv. form of very is verily, now somewhat archaic.] 1. Truly; actually. [Obsolete or archaic.]

These sothely [ben] the mesures of the auter in a cubit most verre. Wyclif, Ezek. xliii. 13.

2. In a high degree; to a great extent; extremely; exceedingly. Very does not qualify a verb directly, and hence also, properly and usually, not a past participle: thus, very much frightened, because it frightened him very much; and so in other cases. This rule, however, is not seldom violated, especially in England: thus, very pleased, instead of very much pleased.

We can call him no great Author, yet he writes very much, and with the infamy of the Court is maintain'd in his libels. Bp. Earle, Micro-cosmographie, An Aturney.

Ye lied, ye lied, my very bonny may.
The Broom of Cowdenknows (Child's Ballads, IV. 49).

Your meat sall be of the very very best.
Johnie of Cocklesmuir (Child's Ballads, VI. 17).

Verzenay (ver-ze-nā'), n. [< Verzenay (see def.).] Wine produced in the ancient province of Champagne, near Verzenay, a locality southeast of Rheims. (a) A white still wine. Compare Sillery. (b) One of several brands of champagne, excellent drinking-wine, but not considered of the highest class.

Vesalian (vē-sā'li-an), a. [< Vesalius (see def.) + -an.] Associated with the anatomist Vesalius (1514–64): as, the Vesalian foramen (foramen Vesalii) of the sphenoid bone (a small venous opening).

vesania (vē-sā'ni-ä), n. [NL., < L. vesania, væsania, madness, < vesanus, væsanus, not of sound mind, < ve-, not, + sanus, sound, sane: see sane[1].] Disease of the mind; insanity.

vese†, n. [< ME. vese, a rush of wind; cf. vesen, fesen, drive away: see feeze.] A blast of wind; a storm; commotion.

Therout came a rage, and such a vese
That it made al the gates for to rese.
Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 1127.

vesi (vā'si), n. [Fiji Islands.] A leguminous tree, Intsia bijuga, found in tropical Asia, the Seychelles, the Malayan islands, and Polynesia. It is an erect tree 50 feet in height, with something of the aspect of the European beech. In the Fiji Islands this and the tamanu are the best timber-trees, its wood seeming almost indestructible, and being there used for canoes, pillows, kava-bowls, etc. The tree was held sacred by the natives.

vesica (vē-sī'kä), n.; pl. vesicæ (-sē). [L., the bladder, a blister, a bag, purse, etc.] 1. In anat., a bladder; a cyst; a sac; especially, the urinary bladder, or urocyst, the permanently pervious part of the allantoic sac.—2. In bot., same as vesicle.—Trigonum vesicæ. See trigonum.—Vesica fellea, the gall-bladder or cholecyst; the hepatic cyst.—Vesica piscis (a fish's bladder), a symbol of Christ, a figure of a pointed oval form, made properly by the intersection of two equal circles each of which passes through the center of the other. The actual figure of a fish found on the sarcophagi of the early Christians was replaced later by this figure, which was a common emblem in the middle ages, with reference to the Greek ἰχθύς (= fish), a word containing the initial letters of Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς Θεοῦ Υἱὸς, Σωτήρ (Jesus Christ, Son of God, the Saviour). It is met with sculptured, painted on glass, in ecclesiastical seals, etc. The aureola in representations of the members of the Trinity, of the Virgin, etc., is generally of this form. See cuts under aureola and glory.—Vesica prostatica. Same as prostatic vesicle (see prostatic).—Vesica urinæ, vesica urinaria, the urinary bladder.

vesical (ves'i-kal), a. [= F. vésical; as vesica + -al.] Of or pertaining to a vesica; cystic; especially, pertaining to the urinary bladder: as, vesical arteries, veins, or nerves; vesical distention.—Vesical arteries, branches of the anterior division of the internal iliac artery distributed to the bladder. The inferior is distributed to the lower part of the bladder, to the prostate, and to the vesiculæ seminales, and is also called vesicoprostatic artery. The middle, a small branch of the superior, is distributed to the base of the bladder and the vesiculæ seminales. The superior, that part of the hypogastric artery of the fetus which is not obliterated, supplies the fundus and body of the bladder.—Vesical calculus, stone in the bladder.—Vesical ligaments, the ligaments of the bladder, the anterior and lateral true ligaments.—Vesical plexus, sacculus, triangle. See the nouns.—Vesical synovial membrane. Same as bursal synovial membrane. See synovial.—Vesical trigone. Same as trigonum vesicæ. See trigonum.—Vesical uvula, the uvula vesicæ, or uvula of the bladder, a prominence situated at the inferior angle of the trigonum.—Vesical veins, the veins collecting the blood that has passed through the capillaries of the bladder. They are more numerous than the corresponding arteries.

vesicant (ves'i-kant), a. and n. [= F. vésicant; as vesica + -ant.] I. a. Producing a bleb or blister; blistering; epispastic; vesicatory.

II. n. A vesicating agent; an epispastic or vesicatory, as cantharides; a blister.

Vesicaria (ves-i-kā'ri-ä), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), from the bladdery pod; < L. vesicaria, a plant reputed to be efficacious in diseases of the bladder, < vesica, bladder: see vesica.] A genus of cruciferous plants, of the tribe Hesperideæ. It is characterized by a much-branched stem, stellate pubescence, and flowers which are usually yellow, and are followed by a globose many-seeded silicle with a slender style. There are two species, natives of central Europe and the Mediterranean region. They are herbs with entire sinuate or pinnatifid leaves, hoary with short forking or branching hairs. The North American species formerly referred to this genus belong to Lesquerella and Physaria and differ from Vesicaria in having smaller flowers and pods, the latter with a more or less nerved septum. V. utriculata of the south of Europe produces conspicuous fruit-pouches of the size of a large pea. The species of Lesquerella are particularly abundant in Texas, but extend north to the Saskatchewan, Labrador, and Greenland, and one, L. arctica, becomes, at latitude 81°44′, in Grinnell Land, one of the most persistent of arctic plants, and forms a dome-like tuft about 4 inches high, sending down very long deep roots.

vesicate (ves'i-kāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. vesicated, ppr. vesicating. [< vesica + -ate[2].] To raise vesicles, blisters, or little bladders on; inflame and separate the cuticle of; blister.

Celsus proposes that in all these internal wounds the external parts be vesicated, to make more powerful revulsion from within. Wiseman, Surgery.

Vesicating collodion, collodion containing cantharides in solution, used as an external application to produce a blister.—Vesicating plaster. See plaster.

vesication (ves-i-kā'shon), n. [= F. vésication; as vesicate + -ion.] The formation of blisters; a blister.

vesicatory (ves'i-kā-tō-ri), a. and n. [= F. vésicatoire; as vesicate + -ory.] I. a. Vesicant; epispastic: as, a vesicatory beetle.

II. n.; pl. vesicatories (-riz). An irritating substance applied to the skin for the purpose of causing a blister.

vesicle (ves'i-kl), n. [= F. vésicule, < L. vesicula, a little blister, a vesicle, dim. of vesica, bladder, blister: see vesica.] 1. Any small bladder-like structure, cavity, cell, or the like, in a body; a membranous or vesicular vessel or cavity; a little sac or cyst. Also vesicule. (a) In anat. and zoöl., a small bladder or sac: a generic term of wide application to various hollow structures, otherwise of very different character and requiring specification by a qualifying word. Many such formations are embryonic and so transitory, and have other distinctive names when matured. (b) In pathol., a circumscribed elevation of the epidermis containing serous fluid. (c) In bot., a small bladder, or bladder-like air-cavity. Also vesica.

2. A minute hollow sphere or bubble of water or other liquid.—Acoustic vesicle. Same as auditory vesicle.—Allantoic or allantoid vesicle. Same as allantois.—Auditory vesicle. See auditory, and cut under Synaptidæ.—Blastodermic vesicle. See blastodermic.—Cerebral vesicles, anterior, middle, and posterior, the three membranous vesicular expansions of which the brain primitively consists, corresponding to the fore-brain, mid-brain, and hind-brain, the various thickenings and foldings of the walls of the vesicles giving rise to the substance of the brain, and the modified communicating cavities of the vesicles becoming the ventricles of the brain. These vesicles appear (unlettered) in the cut under embryo. The three commonly become five by subdivision of two of them, corresponding to the five main encephalic segments which are recognized in most vertebrates, and may be specified by the name of the segment to which they respectively give rise, as the prosencephalic, etc., vesicle (see cut under vi. cerebral). Certain other vesicular protrusions of the embryonic encephalon provide for the formation of so much of the organs of the special senses of smell and sight as is derived from the brain, one being the rhinencephalic vesicle, the other the ocular, ophthalmic, or optic vesicle; both of these are paired. See cuts under amnion and cerebral (cut 4).—Embryonal vesicle, in bot. See embryonal.—Germinal vesicle. See germinal.—Graafian vesicle, a cavity in the ovary which contains an ovum; the capsule or calyx of an ovum, which, when the ovum is ripe, is ruptured to discharge the ovum into the peritoneal cavity, or the Fallopian tube or oviduct. Also called Graafian follicle.—Malignant vesicle, anthrax.—Marginal, ocular, optic vesicle. See the adjectives.—Ophthalmic vesicle. Same as ocular vesicle.—Ovarian, polar, Polian, prostatic, etc., vesicle. See the adjectives.—Purkinjean vesicle, or vesicle of Purkinje, the germinal vesicle.—Rhinencephalic vesicle, the vesicular protrusion of a part of the prosencephalon of the embryo to form the rhinencephalon. Its hollow is primitively continuous with that of a lateral cerebral ventricle, and may persist as a rhinocœlia, but it is usually obliterated.—Seminal vesicles, two membranous receptacles for the semen, situated one on each side of the base of the bladder, between it and the rectum. In man each consists of a tube of about the size of a quill, of from 4 to 6 inches in length when unrolled, somewhat coiled, and repeatedly doubled upon itself, ending opposite the base of the prostate by uniting with a vas deferens to form an ejaculatory duct. Seminal vesicles exist in the males of many animals, being in general hollow offsets from or diverticula of the deferent duct of the testis or its equivalent, but also existing under many different modifications, especially in invertebrates. The more comprehensive name of such formations is spermatocyst. The corresponding structure in the female of some invertebrates, for the reception and detention of the male secretion, is a spermatotheca. See cuts under Dendrocœla, Nematoidea, Proteolepas, and Rhabdocœla.—Serous vesicle, the false amnion (which see, under amnion).—Umbilical vesicle, the yolk-cavity of any vertebrate, when it has formed a sac or cyst hanging from the umbilicus, its cavity being continuous with the intestinal cavity of the embryo. It is the seat of the earliest blood-circulation, and the organ of nutrition for the whole period of fetal life in anallantoic animals; but in those animals which develop an allantois and amnion, and especially a placenta, its function is temporary, being soon superseded by that of the allantois. See cuts under embryo and uterus.—Vasoperitoneal vesicle. See vasoperitoneal.

vesicocele (ves'i-kō-sēl), n. [< L. vesica, the bladder, + Gr. κήλη, tumor.] Cystocele; hernia of the bladder.

vesicoprostatic (ves″i-kō-pros-tat'ik), a. Pertaining to the urinary bladder and to the prostate gland.—Vesicoprostatic artery. Same as inferior vesical artery. See vesical arteries, under vesical.

vesicopubic (ves″i-kō-pū'bik), a. Pertaining to the urinary bladder and to the pubes: as, a vesicopubic ligament.

vesicotomy (ves-i-kot'ō-mi), n. [< L. vesica, the bladder, + Gr. -τομία, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] The operation of incising a bladder, usually the urinary bladder.

vesico-umbilical (ves″i-kō-um-bil'i-kal), a. Pertaining to the urinary bladder and to the umbilicus.—Vesico-umbilical ligament, the urachus.

vesico-uterine (ves″i-kō-ū'tėr-in), a. Pertaining to the urinary bladder and to the uterus.—Vesico-uterine ligaments, two semilunar folds which pass from the posterior surface of the bladder to the neck of the uterus.—Vesico-uterine pouch. See pouch.

vesicovaginal (ves″i-kō-vaj'i-nal), a. Pertaining to the bladder and to the vagina: as, the vesicovaginal septum. Also vaginovesical.—Vesicovaginal fistula, an abnormal communication between the bladder and the vagina, generally resulting from sloughing of the parts consequent upon prolonged pressure of the head of the child in difficult labor. See Simon's and Sims's operations, under operation.—Vesicovaginal plexus. See plexus.

vesicula (vē-sik'ū-lä), n.; pl. vesiculæ (-lē). [L.] A vesicle.—Vesiculæ seminales, the seminal vesicles (which see, under vesicle).—Vesicula fellea, the gall-bladder.—Vesicula prostatica, the prostatic vesicle (which see, under prostatic).—Vesicula serosa. Same as false amnion (which see, under amnion).

vesicular (vē-sik'ū-lär), a. [= F. vésiculaire = Sp. Pg. vesicular, < L. vesicula, vesicle: see vesicle.] 1. In anat. and zoöl.: (a) Of or pertaining to a vesicle; of the form or nature of a vesicle; cystic; bladdery. (b) Having a vesicle; vesiculate; full of or consisting of vesicles, especially when they are small and numerous; areolar; cellular: as, the vesicular tissue of the lungs; a vesicular polyp.—2. In bot., pertaining to or consisting of vesicles; appearing as if composed of small bladders; bladdery.

The terms Parenchymatous, Areolar, Utricular, and Vesicular, when applied to vegetable tissues, may be considered as synonymous. Balfour.

3. In geol., the epithet applied to rocks having a cellular structure, the cavities being rather large and well rounded, but not very abundant. A vesicular structure is intermediate in character between those denominated cellular and slaggy; but these distinctions are not usually very distinctly marked or very carefully maintained.—Normal vesicular murmur. See murmur.—Posterior vesicular column, Clarke's column. See column, and cut of spinal cord (under spinal).—Vesicular ascidian polypst, the Vesiculariidæ.—Vesicular column of the spinal cord, the ganglionic column, composed of a series of nerve-cells.—Vesicular columns of Clarke. See columns of Clarke, under column.—Vesicular cylinder, Clarke's column. See column, and cut of spinal cord (under spinal).—Vesicular eczema. See eczema.—Vesicular emphysema. See emphysema.—Vesicular erysipelas, erysipelas associated with the formation of vesicles.—Vesicular fever, pemphigus.—Vesicular flies. See Vesiculosa.—Vesicular glands, in bot., glands containing a volatile oil, placed just beneath the epidermis of the leaf, as in St.-John's-wort and myrtle, or of the bark, as in the orange.—Vesicular quality, the quality of sound in vesicular respiratory murmur.—Vesicular râle. See râle.—Vesicular resonance. See resonance.—Vesicular respiratory murmur. See respiratory.—Vesicular stomatitis. Same as aphthous stomatitis (which see, under stomatitis).—Vesicular synovial membrane. See synovial.—Vesicular theory, the theory (now abandoned) that the minute drops of mist, cloud, and fog are hollow vesicles or bubbles.—Vesicular worms†, the cystic worms, or cysticerci and hydatids. They were formerly regarded as adult organisms, several genera of different families of which were named.

Vesicularia (ves″i-kū-lā'ri-ä), n. [NL. (J. V. Thompson): see vesicular.] The typical genus of Vesicularriidæ. V. spinosa is an example.

Vesicularriidæ (ves-i-kū-lā-rī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Vesicularia + -idæ.] A family of ctenostomatous gymnolæmatous polyzoans, whose typical genus is Vesicularia, having the cells, of delicate structure and tubular form, clustered on slender flexible stems.

vesicularly (vē-sik'ū-lär-li), adv. In a vesicular manner; as respects vesicles.

Vesiculata, Vesiculatæ (vē-sik-ū-lā'tä, -tē), n. pl. [NL., neut. or fem. pl. of vesiculatus:* see vesiculate.] 1. The campanularian polyps, or calyptoblastic hydromedusans. See Calyptoblastea and Campanulariæ.—2. A division of radiolarians.

vesiculate (vē-sik′ū-lāt), a. [< NL. vesiculatus*, < L. vesicula, a little bladder or blister: see vesicle.] Having a vesicle or vesicles; formed into or forming vesicular tissue; vesicular.

vesiculate (vē-sik′ū-lāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. vesiculated, ppr. vesiculating. [< vesiculate, a.] To become vesicular.

vesiculation (vē-sik-ū-lā′shon), n. [< vesiculate + -ion.] The formation of vesicles; vesication; a number of vesicles or blebs, as of the skin in some diseases; also, a vesicular or bladdery condition; inflation.

vesicule (ves′i-kūl), n. [< F. vésicule: see vesicle.] Same as vesicle.

vesiculi, n. Plural of vesiculus.

Vesiculiferi (vē-sik-ū-lif′e-rī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of vesiculifer*: see vesiculous and -fer.] Same as Physomycetes.

vesiculiferous (vē-sik-ū-lif′e-rus), a. [< L. vesicula, a vesicle, + ferre = E. bear[1].] Producing or bearing vesicles; vesiculate; physophorous.

vesiculiform (vē-sik′ū-li-fôrm), a. [< L. vesicula, a vesicle, + forma, form.] Like a vesicle; vesicular; bladdery.

vesiculobronchial (vē-sik″ū-lō-brong′ki-al), a. Combining vesicular and bronchial qualities: applied to a respiratory sound.—Vesiculobronchial respiratory murmur. See respiratory.

vesiculocavernous (vē-sik″ū-lō-kav′ėr-nus), a. Partaking of both vesicular and cavernous qualities: applied to a respiratory sound.—Vesiculocavernous respiration. See respiration.

Vesiculosa, Vesiculosæ (vē-sik-ū-lō′sä, -sē), n. pl. [NL. (Latreille), neut. or fem. pl. of L. vesiculosus, full of bladders or blisters: see vesiculous.] In entom., a family of dipterous insects, the vesicular flies, having a bladdery abdomen; the Cyrtidæ or Acroceridæ.

vesiculose (vē-sik′ū-lōs), a. [< L. vesiculosus, full of bladders: see vesiculous.] Full of vesicles; vesiculate; vesicular.

vesiculotubular (vē-sik″ū-lō-tū′bū-lär), a. Combining vesicular and tubular qualities: applied to a respiratory sound.—Vesiculotubular respiration, a respiratory sound in which the normal vesicular murmur is heard, but with an added tubular or blowing quality.

vesiculotympanitic (vē-sik″ū-lō-tim-pa-nit′-ik), a. Partaking of both vesicular and tympanitic qualities: applied to a percussion note.—Vesiculotympanitic resonance. See resonance.

vesiculous (vē-sik′ū-lus), a. [= F. vésiculeux, < L. vesiculosus, full of bladders or blisters, < vesicula, a little bladder or blister: see vesicle.] Same as vesiculose.

vesiculus (vē-sik′ū-lus), n.; pl. vesiculi (-lī). Same as vesicle. Encyc. Brit., XII. 551. [Rare.]

Vespa (ves′pä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1758), < L. vespa, a wasp, = E. wasp, q. v.] A Linnean genus of aculeate hymenopterous insects, formerly of great extent, now restricted to certain social wasps and hornets of the modern family Vespidæ, as the common wasp, V. vulgaris, and the common hornet, V. crabro. See cuts under hornet and wasp. It at first corresponded to Latreille's family Diploptera, but is now restricted to forms having the abdomen sessile, broad and truncate at the base, metathorax very short and truncate, and the basal nervure of the fore wings joining the subcostal at some distance before the stigma. They are short-bodied wasps with folded wings, and are commonly known in the United States as yellow-jackets or hornets. Their nests consist of a series of combs arranged one below another, and enveloped in a papery covering. In tropical regions these nests reach an immense size, those of a Ceylonese species often measuring 6 feet in length. Twenty species occur in the United States and 14 in Europe. V. maculata of North America is the so-called white-faced hornet, and is isotypical with the European V. crabro. The latter has been introduced into the United States, and occurs in New York and New England.

vesper (ves′pėr), n. [< ME. vesper, the evening star, < OF. vespre, evening, the evening star, vespres, even-song, vespers, F. vêpre, evening, vêpres, vespers, = Sp. véspero, the evening star, = Pg. vespero, the evening star, = It. vespero, evening, the evening star, vespers, vespro, vespers, < L. vesper, evening, even, eventide, the evening star, poet. the west, the inhabitants of the west, also, and more frequently, fem. vespera, the evening, eventide, = Gr. ἑσπερος, evening, the evening star, Hesper, of the evening, ἑσπέρα, evening, = OBulg. večerŭ = Serv. Bohem. večer = Pol. wieczor = Russ. večerŭ, evening, = Lith. vakaras = Lett. vakars, evening; akin to Skt. vasati, night, and to E. west. Cf. Hesper.] 1. The evening star, a name given to the planet Venus when she is east of the sun and appears after sunset; hence, the evening.

> Black vesper's pageants. Shak., A. and C., iv. 14. 8.

2. pl. [< LL. vespera. ML. vesperæ, < vespera, evening.] In the Roman Catholic and Greek churches, and in religious houses and as a devotional office in the Anglican Church, the sixth or next to the last of the canonical hours. The observance of this hour is mentioned in the third century by St. Cyprian. The chief features of the Western vespers, besides the psalms and varying hymn, are the Magnificat and the collect for the day. The chief features of the Greek vespers (ἑσπερινός) are the psalms, the ancient hymn "Joyful Light," the prokeimenon, and the Nunc Dimittis. The old English name for vespers is even-song. The Anglican public evening prayer, also called even-song, is mainly a combination and condensation of the Sarum vespers and complin, the part of the office from the first Lord's Prayer to the Magnificat inclusive representing vespers. [Occasionally used in the singular.]

> They [the priests] concluded that dayes ceremonies with their Vespers. Coryat, Crudities, I. 40.
>
> The far bell of vesper, . . .
> Seeming to weep the dying day's decay.
> Byron, Don Juan, iii. 108.

Sicilian Vespers. See Sicilian.—Vesper mouse. See vesper-mouse.

vesperal (ves′pėr-al), a. and n. [< LL. vesperalis, of the evening, < L. vesper, vespera, evening: see vesper.] I. a. Relating to the evening or to vespers. [Rare.]

II. n. That part of the antiphonarium which contains the chants for vespers. Lee's Glossary.

vesper-bell (ves′pėr-bel), n. The bell that summons to vespers.

> Hark the little vesper-bell,
> Which biddeth me to prayer!
> Coleridge, Ancient Mariner, vii.

vesper-bird (ves′pėr-bėrd), n. The common bay-winged bunting of the United States, Poœcetes gramineus: so called from its song, often heard as the shades of night fall. See Poœcetes, and cut under grassfinch. J. Burroughs.

Vesperimus (ves-pėr′i-mus), n. [NL. (Coues, 1874), < L. vesper, the evening, hence the west, + mus, mouse.] The leading genus of American vesper-mice, having as type the common white-footed deer-mouse of North America, usually called Hesperomys leucopus. The name was originally proposed as a subgenus, but Hesperomys has lately (1891) been shown to be untenable in any sense, and by the rules of nomenclature the species above mentioned must be called Peromyscus leucopus (Rafinesque). See cut under deer-mouse.

vesper-mouse (ves′pėr-mous), n.; pl. vesper-mice (-mīs). A mouse of the genus Hesperomys or Peromyscus, or a related form; in the plural, native American mice and murine rodents collectively; the Sigmodontes, as distinguished from the Mures, indigenous to the old world. See the technical words. S. F. Baird, 1857.

vesper-sparrow (ves′pėr-spar″ō), n. The vesper-bird. Coues.

Vespertilio (ves-pėr-til′i-ō), n. [NL., < L. vespertilio(n-), a bat, so called from its flying about in the evening, prob. for vespertinio*(n-), < vespertinus, of the evening: see vespertine.] A Linnean genus of mammals, the fourth and last genus of the Linnean order Primates, containing 6 species, and coextensive with the modern order Chiroptera. Most of the longer-known bats have been placed in Vespertilio. By successive eliminations, the genus has been restricted to about 40 small species, of both hemispheres, as Natter's bat of Europe, V. natteri, and the little brown bat of the United States, V. fuscus, and is regarded as the type of a family Vespertilionidæ. The genus includes many of the smallest and most delicately formed bats, like those just named, having ample wings, the tail inclosed in the interfemoral membrane, no leafy appendage to the nose, no special development of the ears, six grinding teeth in each half of each jaw, and four upper and six lower incisors. See bat[2] and Vespertilionidæ.

Vespertilionidæ (ves-pėr-til-i-on′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Vespertilio(n-) + -idæ.] A family of chiropterous mammals, of which the genus Vespertilio is the type, belonging to the naked-nosed section (Gymnorhina) of insectivorous or microchiropterous bats. It is distinguished, like other Gymnorhina, from the Histiophora, or leaf-nosed section, by the absence of any nasal appendage, and from the true blood-sucking bats by the character of the dentition and digestive organs, and from other Gymnorhina by having the tail inclosed in an ample interfemoral membrane, and special characters of the teeth and skull. The nearest relationships are with the molossoid bats (Molossidæ and Noctilionidæ). The family contains numerous genera, as Vespertilio, Synotus, Plecotus, Atalapha, Antrozous, Nycticejus, Lasiurus, etc., and about 150 species (or more than one third of the whole order Chiroptera) of small bats of most parts of the world. Some of these are also very rich in individuals, and among the best-known representatives of the whole order. The family is primarily divided into two subfamilies, Vespertilioninæ and Nyctitejinæ. See cut under Synotus.

Vespertilioninæ (ves-pėr-til″i-ō-ni′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Vespertilio(n-) + -inæ.] The leading subfamily of Vespertilionidæ, containing about nine tenths of the family, and represented by Vespertilio and about 6 other genera.

vespertilionine (ves-pėr-til′i-ō-nin), a. and n. [< Vespertilio(n-) + -ine[1].] I. a. Resembling a bat of the restricted genus Vespertilio; of or pertaining to the subfamily Vespertilioninæ.—Vespertilionine alliance, one of two series of microchiropteran bats, having the tail inclosed in the interfemoral membrane and a diastema between the middle upper incisors, containing the families Rhinolophidæ, Nycteridæ, and Vespertilionidæ. The tribe is contrasted with the emballonurine alliance.

II. n. A bat of the subfamily Vespertilioninæ or of the vespertilionine alliance.

vespertinal (ves′pėr-tin-al), a. [< vespertine + -al.] Same as vespertine. Lowell, Fireside Travels, p. 73.

vespertine (ves′pėr-tin), a. [= Sp. Pg. It. vespertino, < L. vespertinus, of or belonging to the evening, < vesper, evening: see vesper.] 1. Of or pertaining to the evening; happening or being in the evening. Sir T. Herbert.—2. In bot., opening in the evening, as a flower.—3. [cap.] In geol., noting one of Prof. H. D. Rogers's divisions of the Paleozoic series in Pennsylvania. It corresponds to No. X. of the numbered series of the Pennsylvania Survey, and includes the Pocono sandstone and Conglomerate, forming the base of the Carboniferous, and lying immediately beneath the Mauch Chunk Red Shale (the "Umbral" of Rogers's nomenclature). See Pocono sandstone, under sandstone.

4. In zoöl., crepuscular; flying or otherwise specially active in the twilight of evening, as an insect, a bat, or a bird: as, the vespertine or evening grosbeak, Hesperiphona vespertina.—5. In astron., descending from the meridian to the horizon at the time of sunset.

Vesperugo (ves-pe-rō′gō), n. [NL. (Keyserling and Blasius), < L. vesperugo, a bat, < vesper, evening: see vesper, and cf. Vespertilio.] The most extensive genus of bats of the family Vespertilionidæ and subfamily Vespertilioninæ, typified by the European V. serotinus. They have the incisors $\frac{2}{4}$ or $\frac{1}{3}$, the premolars $\frac{1}{1}$, $\frac{2}{2}$, or $\frac{3}{3}$, and a well-developed post-calcaneal lobule of the interfemoral membrane. They are divided into several subgenera, as Vesperus, Scotozous, Rhogeëssa, and Lasionycteris. The genus is remarkable for its wide distribution in both hemispheres, extending from near the arctic circle to the Strait of Magellan.

vespiary (ves′pi-ā-ri), n.; pl. vespiaries (-riz). [Prop. vespary* (the form vespiary being irreg. conformed to apiary), < L. vespa, a wasp: see wasp.] A hornets' nest; the habitation of social wasps; also, the colony or aggregate of wasps in such a nest. See Vespa, and cut under wasp, and compare apiary and formicary.

Vespidæ (ves′pi-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Stephens, 1829), < Vespa + -idæ.] A family of diplopterous aculeate hymenopterous insects, typified by the genus Vespa; the social wasps and hornets. They are characterized by their two-spurred middle tibiæ and simple tarsal claws. Every species exists in the three forms of male, female or queen, and worker. The males and workers die in the fall, and the impregnated queen alone hibernates. She forms a new colony in the spring, giving birth at first only to workers, and later to males and females. The nests are made of paper, and the young are fed by the workers with nectar and animal and vegetable juices. The principal genera besides Vespa are Polistes and Polybia. See Vespa, and cuts under wasp, hornet, and Polistes.

vespiform (ves′pi-fôrm), a. [< L. vespa, wasp, + forma, form.] Wasp-like; resembling a wasp or hornet to some extent or in some respects: noting certain moths. See hornet-moth.

vespillo† (ves-pil′ō), n. [L., also vespulla, also, according to Festus, vespa, one of the bearers who carried out the bodies of dead poor at night, < vesper, evening: see vesper.] Among the Romans, one who carried out the dead in the evening for burial. Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, i. § 38.

vespine (ves′pin), a. [< L. vespa, wasp, + -ine[1].] Pertaining to wasps; wasp-like. Pop. Sci. Mo., IV. 176.

vessel (ves′el), n. [Early mod. E. also vessell; < ME. vessel, vesselle, fessel, < OF. vessel, veissel, vaissel, F. vaisseau = Sp. vasillo = Pg. vasilha = It. vascello, a vessel, < L. vascellum (in an inscription), a small vase or urn, dim. of vas, a vase, urn: see vase. In def. 6 the word is orig. collective, ME. vessel, vessell, < OF. vesselle*, vaisselle, F. vaisselle, vessels or plate collectively; < vessel, vaissel, a vessel: see above.] 1. A utensil for holding liquors and other things, as a cask, a barrel, a bottle, a kettle, a pot, a cup, or a dish.

> The Arm and the Hond (that he putte in oure Lordes syde, whan he appered to him, aftre his Resurrexioun . . .) is zit lyggynge in a Vesselle with outen the Tombe. Mandeville, Travels, p. 172.

Specifically, in metal., the converter in which Bessemer steel is made. See steel[1].

As far as my observation goes, metallurgical writers almost invariably use the word converter, while in the steel works the word vessel is almost always used.
H. M. Howe, Metal. of Steel, p. 339.

2. A ship; a craft of any kind: usually a larger craft than a boat, but in law often construed to mean any floating structure.

Let 's to the seaside, ho!
As well to see the vessel that 's come in
As to throw out our eyes for brave Othello.
Shak., Othello, ii. 1. 37.

He sent it with a small vessel
That there was quickly gaun to sea.
John Thomson and the Turk (Child's Ballads, III. 353).

3. In anat. and zoöl., any duct or canal in which a fluid, as blood or lymph, is secreted, contained, or conveyed, as an artery, vein, capillary, lymphatic, or spermatic; especially, a blood-vessel. A part or organ pervaded or well provided with vessels is said to be vascular. —4. In bot., same as duct—that is, a row of cells which have lost their intervening partitions, and consequently form a long continuous canal. The walls of the vessel or duct may be variously marked by pits, or by spiral, annular, or reticulated thickenings.

5. Figuratively, something conceived as formed to receive or contain; hence, especially in Scriptural phraseology, a person into whom anything is conceived as poured or infused, or to whom something has been imparted; a recipient.

He is a chosen vessel unto me, to bear my name before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel.
Acts ix. 15.

What if God, willing to shew his wrath, and to make his power known, endured with much long-suffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction? Rom. ix. 22.

6†. Vessels collectively; plate.

The vessel of the temple he with him ladde.
Chaucer, Monk's Tale, l. 158.

'Goth, bringeth forth the vessealx," quod he.
Chaucer, Monk's Tale, l. 204.

Of gold ther is a borde, & tretels ther bi,
Of siluer other vesselle gilte fulle richeli.
Rob. of Brunne, p. 152.

I must comfort the weaker vessel, as doublet and hose ought to show itself courageous to petticoat.
Shak., As you Like it, ii. 4. 6.

vessel† (ves'el), v. t. [< ME. vesselen; < vessel, n.] To put into a vessel.

Aloes tweyne unces epatike;
Let vessel it, and set it uppe in smyke.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 200.

Take that earth and . . . vessel it, and in that . . . set the seed. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 529.

vesselful (ves'el-fûl), n. [< vessel + -ful.] As much as a vessel will hold.

vesselingt, n. [ME. vessellinge; < vessel + -ing[1].] Vessels collectively.

Whenne thai beth colde in pitched vessellinge
And cleyed close hem up.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 118.

vesselmentt, n. [< ME. vesselment, vesselement, < OF. vaissellement, vessels, plate, furniture, < vaisselle, vessels, plate: see vessel.] Plate; furniture. Halliwell.

Wyth slyȝt of his ciences, his souerayn to loue.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), ii. 1288.

vesses (ves'ez), n. [Also vessets; prob. connected with ME. fasel, a fringe, AS. fæs, thread, fiber.] A sort of worsted. Halliwell.

vessignon (ves'i-nyon), n. [< F. vessignon, a wind-gall (on a horse), < L. vesica, a bladder, a blister: see vesica.] A kind of soft swelling on a horse's leg; a wind-gall.

vest (vest), n. [< F. veste, a vest, jacket, = Sp. Pg. veste = It. veste, vesta, < L. vestis, a garment, gown, robe, vestment, clothing, vesture, = Goth. wasti, clothes; cf. Gr. ἑσθής, dress, clothing; < √ ves = Gr. ἕννυναι (√ Fεσ), clothe, = Skt. √ vas, put on (clothes), = Goth. wasjan = AS. werian, put on (clothes), wear: see wear[1]. From the L. vestis are also ult. E. vest, v., vestment, vestry, vesture, divest, invest, travesty, etc.] 1. An article of clothing covering the person; an outer garment; a vestment. [Archaic.]

Over his lucid arms
A military vest of purple flow'd.
Milton, P. L., xi. 241.

The rivets of the vest
Which girds in steel his ample breast.
Whittier, Mogg Megone, iii.

2. Figuratively, garment; dress; array; vesture.

Not seldom, clad in radiant vest,
Deceitfully goes forth the morn.
Wordsworth, Near the Spring of the Hermitage.

Wherever he be flown, whatever vest
The being hath put on which lately here
So many-friended was. Lowell, Agassiz, vi. 2.

3. A body-garment for men's wear, at different times of distinct types. (a) Originally, a garment like a cassock, said by Pepys to have been adopted by Charles II. as the fashion for his court, and ridiculed by Louis XIV. of France, who put his servants into such vests.

You are not to learn,
At these Years, how absolutely necessary a rich Vest
And a Perruque are to a Man that aims at their [ladies']
Favours. Etherege, She Would if she Could, iii. 3.

The vest is gathered up before them [figures on medals] like an apron, which you must suppose filled with fruits as well as the cornu-copiæ. Addison, Ancient Medals, ii.

Under his doublet Charles appeared in a vest, "being a long cassock," as Pepys explains, "close to the body, of black cloth and pinked with white silk under it."
Encyc. Brit., VI. 473.

(b) A body-garment of later times; especially, the waistcoat in the ordinary modern sense—that is, a short garment without sleeves, buttoning down the front, and having the back concealed by the coat.

Numerous pegs with coats and "pants" and "vests"—as he was in the habit of calling waistcoats and pantaloons or trousers—hanging up as if the owner had melted out of them. O. W. Holmes, Professor, vii.

If tailors would only print upon waistcoats, I would give double price for a vest bearing this inscription.
R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, lxvi.

4. An outer garment, or part of such a garment, for women. Especially—(a) A sort of jacket with or without sleeves, and known by many different names according to changing fashion: as, Breton vest, Oriental vest, etc. (b) A trimming or facing of the front of the bodice, sometimes with a different material, and following more or less closely the form of a man's vest: a fashion often reappearing. Over the vest of this form a coat is generally worn.

5. An undergarment knitted or woven on the stocking-loom. Vest and undervest are more common in England; undershirt in the United States.

vest (vest), v. [< OF. vestir, F. vêtir = Sp. Pg. vestir = It. vestire, < L. vestire, clothe, dress, < vestis, a garment, clothing: see vest, n. Cf. wear[1], v.] I. trans. 1. To clothe with or as with a garment, vest, or vestment; robe; dress; cover, surround, or encompass closely.

Vested all in white, pure as her mind.
Milton, Sonnets, xviii.

2. To invest or clothe, as with authority; put in possession (of); endow; put more or less formally in occupation (of): followed by with.

To settle men's consciences, 'tis necessary that they know the person who by right is vested with power over them. Locke.

Had I been vested with the Monarch's Pow'r, Thou must have sigh'd, unlucky Youth, in vain.
Prior, To Mr. Howard.

3. To place or put in possession or at the disposal of; give or confer formally or legally an immediate fixed right of present or future possession, occupancy, or enjoyment of; commit to: followed by in.

So, instead of getting licenses in mortmain to enable him to vest his lands in the Gild of the Holy Cross, he made a deed of feoffment, vesting them in persons therein named. English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 252.

I will not trust executive power, vested in the hands of a single magistrate, to keep the vigils of liberty.
D. Webster, Speech, Senate, May 7, 1834.

4. To lay out, as money or capital; invest: as, to vest money in land. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.

II. intrans. 1. To put on clothing or vestments.

Even in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries it was the common custom for priests, at least in England, to vest in the sanctuary. Cath. Dict., p. 888.

2. To come or descend; devolve; take effect, as a title or right: with in.

The supreme power could not be said to vest in them exclusively. Brougham.

It is already the usage to speak of a trust as a thing that vests, and as a thing that may be divested.
Bentham, Introd. to Morals and Legislation, xvi. 27, note.

To vest in interest, to pass or devolve as matter of right or title irrespective of any immediate right of possession. —To vest in possession, to pass in possession or immediate right of possession. See vested.

Vesta (ves'tä), n. [L., = Gr. Ἑστία, the goddess of the hearth, √ vas, Skt. √ ush, burn: see ustion, Aurora, Easter.] 1. One of the chief divinities of the ancient Romans, equivalent to the Greek Hestia, one of the twelve great Olympians, the virgin goddess of the hearth, presiding over both the private family altar and the central altar of the city, the tribe, or the race. She was worshiped along with the Penates at every meal, when the family assembled round the altar or hearth, which was in the center of the house. Æneas was said to have carried the sacred fire (which was her symbol) from Troy, and brought it to Italy, and it was preserved at Rome by the state in the sanctuary of the goddess, which stood in the Forum. To guard this fire from becoming extinguished, it was watched and tended by six stainless virgins, called vestals. The Roman temples of Vesta were circular, preserving the form of the primitive huts of the Latin race, because it was in such a hut that the sacred fire was first tended by the young girls while their parents and brothers were absent in the chase or pasture-ground. See also cuts under hut-urn and monopteron.

The Giustiniani Statue of Vesta (Hestia).—Torlonia Museum, Rome.

2. The fourth and brightest planetoid, discovered by Olbers in 1807.—3. [l. c.] A wax match which may be ignited by friction.

The door of a small closet here attracted the young man's attention; and, striking a vesta, he opened it and entered. R. L. Stevenson, The Dynamiter, p. 178.

vestal (ves'tal), a. and n. [= F. vestale, n., = Sp. Pg. vestal = It. vestale, < L. Vestalis, of Vesta, as a noun (sc. virgo) a vestal virgin, < Vesta, Vesta: see Vesta.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to Vesta, the classical goddess of the sacred fire and of the household and the state.

When thou shouldst come,
Then my cot with light should shine
Purer than the vestal fire.
Drayton, Shepherd's Sirena.

2. Pertaining to or characteristic of a vestal virgin or a nun.

Vestal modesty. Shak., R. and J., iii. 3. 38.

My vestal habit me contenting more Than all the robes adorning me before.
Drayton, Matilda to King John.

II. n. 1. Among the ancient Romans, a virgin consecrated to Vesta and to the service of watching the sacred fire, which was kept perpetually burning upon her altar. The vestals were at first four in number, afterward six. They entered the service of the goddess at from six to ten years of age, their term of service lasting thirty years. They were then permitted to retire and to marry, but few did so, for, as vestals, they were treated with great honor, and had important public privileges. Their persons were inviolable, any offense against them being punished with death, and they were treated in all their relations with the highest distinction and reverence. A vestal who broke her vow of chastity was immured alive in an underground vault amid public mourning. There were very few such instances; in one of them, under Domitian, the chief of the vestals was put to death under a false charge trumped up by the emperor.

Hence—2. A virgin; a woman of spotless chastity; sometimes, a virgin who devotes her life entirely to the service of religion; a nun; a religieuse.

Shall 's go hear the vestals sing?
Shak., Pericles, iv. 5. 7.

She would a dedicated vestal prove,
And give her virgin vows to heaven and love.
Crabbe, Works, VII. 94.

3. In entom.: (a) The geometrid moth Sterrha sacraria: popularly so called in England. (b) A gossamer-winged butterfly; any member of the Vestales.

Vestalest (ves-tā'lēz), n. pl. [NL.: see vestal.] A group of butterflies; the vestals, virgins, or gossamer-winged butterflies.

vestamentt, n. Same as vestment.

His vestaments sit as if they grew upon him.
Massinger, Fatal Dowry, iv. 1.

vested (ves'ted), p. a. 1. Clothed; especially, wearing, or having assumed, state robes or some ceremonial costume: as, a vested choir.

A troop of yellow-vested white-haired Jews,
Bound for their own land, where redemption dawns.
Browning, Paracelsus, iv.

2. In her., clothed; draped: used especially when the clothing is of a different tincture from the rest of the bearing. This blazon is more usual when only a part of the body is represented. Also clothed.—3. Not in a state of contingency or suspension; fixed. In law: (a) Already acquired; existing, in contemplation of law, in a certain person as owner: as, a law is not to be construed so as to impair vested rights without compensation. See right. (b) Noting the quality of a present absolute right or interest, as distinguished from that which is defeasible. Thus, a legacy is said to be vested when given in such terms that the legatee has a present right to its future payment which is not defeasible, and he can therefore extinguish it by release. (c) Noting the quality of a present estate even though defeasible, as distinguished from that the very existence of which is contingent. Thus, a devise of land is said to be vested when the circumstances are such that the legatee is existing and known, and would be immediately entitled to possession were the precedent estate to terminate, although the time may not have come when he is entitled to receive it, and although it is possible that before that time comes another person may come into being who will take in preference to him. Meanwhile it is said to be vested in interest, but not vested in possession.—Vested remainder. See remainder, 3.

vester (ves'tėr), n. One who invests money or other property; an investor. [Rare.]

But in another of their papers . . . they declare that their vesters aim at nothing short of a community in land and in goods. Southey, To W. S. Landor, Aug. 22, 1829.

vestiarian (ves-ti-ā'ri-an), a. [< vestiary + -an.] Same as vestiary.

vestiary (ves'ti-ā-ri), a. and n. [= F. vestiaire, a., = Sp. vestuario = Pg. vestiario, vestuario, n., = It. vestiario, a. and n., < L. vestiarius, of or pertaining to clothes, neut. vestiarium, a wardrobe, ML. a robing-room, vestry, < vestis, clothing: see vest. Cf. vestry.] I. a. Of or pertaining to costume or dress. Bp. Hall, Select Thoughts, § 93.

II. n.; pl. vestiaries (-riz). 1. A room or place for the keeping of vestments, garments, or clothes; a wardrobe. Fuller. [Rare.]—2. Garb; clothing.

If I throw my cloak over a fugitive slave to steal him, it is so short and straight, so threadbare and chinky, that he would be recognized by the idlest observer who had seen him seven years ago in the market-place; but if thou hadst enveloped him in thy versicolored and cloudlike vestiary, puffed and effuse, rustling and rolling, nobody could guess well what animal was under it, much less what man. Landor, Imag. Conv., Diogenes and Plato.

3†. A vestibule; a place of entrance; a court.

Thei wenten . . . in the hows of a manner man in Bahurym, that had a pit in his vestiary.
Wyclif, 2 Ki. [Sam.] xvii. 18.

vestibula, n. Plural of vestibulum.

vestibular (ves-tib'ū-lär), a. [< vestibule + ★-ar[3].] Of, pertaining to, or resembling a vestibule, in any sense.—Vestibular artery, a branch of the internal auditory artery distributed, in the form of a minute capillary network, in the substance of the membranous labyrinth.—Vestibular membrane. Same as membrane of Reissner (which see, under membrane).—Vestibular nerve, the branch of the auditory nerve distributed to the vestibule.—Vestibular passage. Same as scala vestibuli (which see, under scala).—Vestibular saccule or sacculus. See saccule.—Vestibular seta, the bristle that projects from the vestibule of the Vorticellidæ: originally called in French soie de Lachmann. W. S. Kent.

vestibulate (ves-tib'ū-lāt), a. [< vestibule + -ate[1].] In anat. and zoöl., having a vestibule, in any sense; formed into a vestibule; vestibular.

vestibule (ves'ti-būl), n. [< F. vestibule = Sp. vestíbulo = Pg. It. vestibulo, < L. vestibulum, a forecourt, entrance-court, an entrance; variously explained: (a) 'a place separated from the (main) abode,' < ve-, apart, + stabulum, abode (see stable[1]); (b) 'abode,' < √ ves, Skt. √ vas, dwell (see was); (c) possibly 'the place where the outer clothing is put on or off as one goes out or comes in,' i. e. the place corresponding to that assigned to the modern hat-rack (cf. vestry), < vestis, garment, clothing.] 1. A passage, hall, or antechamber next the outer door of a house, from which doors open into the various inner rooms; a porch; a lobby; a hall; a narthex. See cuts under opisthodomus, porch, and pronaos.

In the intention of the early builders of the church, the vestibule, or atrium, was regarded as that portion of the sacred building which was appropriated to those who had not been received into the full standing of members of the Church of Christ.
C. E. Norton, Travel and Study in Italy, p. 186.

2. In anat.: (a) A part of the labyrinth of the ear, the common or central cavity, between the semicircular canals and the cochlea, communicating permanently with the former, and temporarily or permanently with the latter, from the proper membranous cavity of which it is generally shut off subsequently, opening into the tympanum or middle ear by the fenestra ovalis, which, however, is closed in life by a membrane. See cuts under ear[1] and temporal. (b) A triangular space between the nymphæ or labia minora of the human female and some anthropoid apes, containing the orifice of the urethra, or meatus urinarius. More fully called vestibule of the vulva and vestibulum vaginæ. (c) A part of the left ventricular cavity of the heart, adjoining the root of the aorta.—3. In zoöl.: (a) A depression of the body-wall of sundry infusorians, as Paramecium and Noctiluca, leading to the oral and sometimes also to the anal aperture, and thus connected, by means of an esophageal canal, with the endosarc. See Vorticella, Noctiluca, and cut under Paramecium. (b) In polyzoans, an outer chamber of a cell of the polyzoary, which opens on the surface, and into which, in some forms, the pharynx and anus both open.—Aortic vestibule. See aortic.—Common sinus of the vestibule. Same as utricle, 2.—Membranous vestibule, the membranous sac contained within the osseous vestibule, in some animals, as in man, divided into a larger section, the utricle or utriculus, and a lesser, the saccule or sacculus.—Osseous vestibule, the bony cavity in the petrosal bone, in nearly all vertebrates inclosed by the proötic, epiotic, and opisthotic bones, and inclosing the membranous vestibule.—Pyramid of the vestibule. See pyramid.—Utricle of the vestibule. See utricle.—Vestibule of the larynx, that part of the laryngeal cavity which lies above the false vocal cords.—Vestibule of the mouth, the cavity of the mouth outside of the teeth, technically called vestibulum oris.—Vestibule of the pharynx, the fauces; the passage from the mouth to the pharynx, bounded laterally by the pillars of the fauces.—Vestibule of the vulva. See def. 2 (b).—Vestibule train. See vestibule, v. t. = Syn. 1. See definitions of porch, portico, hall, lobby, passage.

vestibule (ves'ti-būl), v. t.; pret. and pp. vestibuled, ppr. vestibuling. [< vestibule, n.] To provide with a vestibule.—Vestibuled train, a train of passenger-cars each of which is provided with a "vestibule" at each end—that is, a part of the platform is so inclosed at the sides that when the cars are connected together a continuous passage from car to car is formed. [U. S.]

vestibulum (ves-tib'ū-lum), n.; pl. vestibula (-lą). [NL.: see vestibule.] In anat. and zoöl., a vestibule.—Aquæductus vestibuli. See aquæductus.—Pyramis vestibuli. See pyramis.—Scala vestibuli. See scala.—Utriculus vestibuli. Same as utricle, 2.—Vestibulum oris, the vestibule of the mouth (which see, under vestibule).—Vestibulum vaginæ. Same as vestibule, 2 (b). vestigate† (ves'ti-gāt), v. t. [< L. vestigatus, pp. of vestigare, track, trace out, < vestigium, a footprint, track: see vestige. Cf. investigate.] To investigate.

★vestige (ves'tij), n. [< F. vestige = Sp. Pg. It. vestigio, < L. vestigium, footstep, footprint, track, the sole of the foot, a trace, mark.] 1. A footprint; a footstep; a track; a trace; hence, a mark, impression, or appearance of something which is no longer present or in existence; a sensible evidence or visible sign of something absent, lost, or perished; remains of something passed away.

Scarce any trace remaining, vestige gray,
Or nodding column on the desert shore,
To point where Corinth, or where Athens stood.
Thomson, Liberty, ii.

I could discover no vestiges of common houses in Dendera more than in any other of the great towns in Egypt.
Bruce, Source of the Nile, I. 105.

What vestiges of liberty or property have they left?
Burke, Rev. in France.

2. In biol., any vestigial organ or tissue, having little or no utility, but corresponding to a useful part existing in some lower animal. See vestigial and rudiment, 3.—Syn. See trace[1].

vestigia, n. Plural of vestigium.

vestigial (ves-tij'i-al), a. [< L. vestigium, footprint (see vestige), + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of a vestige; like a mere trace of what has been; also, rudimentary. In biology vestigial has a specific application to those organs or structures which are commonly called rudimentary, and are rudimentary in fact, but which are properly regarded, not as beginnings or incipient states, but as remains of parts or structures which have been better developed in an earlier stage of existence of the same organism, or in lower preceding organisms, and have aborted or atrophied, or become otherwise reduced or rudimental in the evolution of the individual or of the species. Thus, the parovaria, the canals of Gärtner, the male womb, the urachus, and the round ligament of the liver are vestigial structures with reference to the Wolffian bodies and allantois of the fetus; the thymus of the adult is vestigial with reference to that structure in the infant; the vermiform appendix of the colon is vestigial with reference to the very large cæcum of a ruminant; the stunted coracoid process of the scapula of a mammal is a vestigial structure with reference to the large articulated coracoid bone of a bird. Vestigial structures of any kind, or the remains of what has been, are to be carefully distinguished from rudimentary structures, or the beginning of what is to be (as fully explained under rudimentary). They are very significant biological facts, of which much use has been made by Darwin and other modern evolutionists in tracing lines of descent with modification and determining probable ancestry.—Vestigial fold, a projection of the pericardium over the root of the left lung, caused by a cord which is the remains of the nearly obliterated ductus Cuvieri, or sinus of Cuvier, of the fetus.—Vestigial muscle, a muscle, like those of the external ear, which is of use in the lower animals, but poorly developed and scarcely functional in man.—Syn. Abortive, etc. See rudimentary.

vestigiary (ves-tij'i-ā-ri), a. [< L. vestigium, footprint, + -ary.] Vestigial.

vestigium (ves-tij'i-um), n.; pl. vestigia (-ą). [L.: see vestige.] In anat., a vestige; a vestigial structure of any kind; a trace, as the pit which marks the closed foramen ovale between the right and left auricles of the heart.—Vestigium foraminis ovalis, the fovea or fossa ovalis.—Vestigia rerum, traces of things. See the quotation.

It is not to be doubted that those motions which give rise to sensation leave in the brain changes of its substance which answer to what Haller called "vestigia rerum," and to what that great thinker, David Hartley, termed "Vibratiuncules."
Huxley, Address before the British Association at Belfast, 1874.

vestiment†, n. An obsolete variant of vestment.

vesting (ves'ting), n. [< vest + -ing[1].] Cloth especially made for men's waistcoats: most commonly in the plural.

vestiture (ves'ti-tūr), n. [< L. vestire, pp. vestitus, dress, clothe (see vest), + -ure. Cf. vesture, investiture.] 1†. The manufacture or preparation of cloth. R. Parke.—2†. Investiture.—3. In zoöl., the hairs, scales, etc., covering a surface: as, the vestiture of the thorax of an insect.

vestlet (vest'let), n. [< vest + -let.] A tubicolous sea-anemone of the genus Cerianthus, as C. borealis. It is not fixed to any support, and remarkably resembles a cephalobranchiate worm, having a long, smooth, slender body or stalk tapering to a free base, and surmounted by a large double wreath of tentacles. The stem is a tube secreted by the polyp and investing it (whence the name). It is 6 or 8 inches long, and the wreath expands an inch or more. See Cerianthus, and compare cut under Edwardsia.

Vestlet (Cerianthus borealis), one third natural size.

vestment (vest'ment), n. [Formerly also vestiment, vestament; < ME. vestement, < OF. vestement, F. vêtement = Sp. vestimento, m., vestimenta, f., = Pg. vestimenta = It. vestimento, m., vestimenta, f., < L. vestimentum, clothing, covering, < vestire, clothe: see vest, v.] 1. A covering or garment; some part of clothing or dress; an article of clothing; especially, some part of outer clothing; specifically, a ceremonial or official robe or garment.

Hir vestiments which that they were.
Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 2090.

The judges in their vestments of state attended to give advice on points of law. Macaulay, Warren Hastings.

2. Eccles.: (a) One of the garments worn, in addition to the cassock and ordinary dress, by the clergy and their assistants, choristers, etc., during divine service and the administration of the sacraments; especially, one of the garments so worn by the celebrant, deacon, and subdeacon during the celebration of the eucharist; specifically, the chasuble, or the chasuble with the other eucharistic garments and ornaments, especially the amice, stole, and maniple. From monumental and other evidence it appears that the type of the principal ecclesiastical vestments has always been nearly the same; that this agreed on the whole with the general style of dress among Greeks, Romans, and Orientals; and that in certain respects it agreed with official rather than common civil dress and with Syrian rather than Greek or Roman costume. (b) One of the cloths or coverings of the altar.

vestral (ves'tral), a. [< vestr-y + -al.] Of or pertaining to a vestry.

vestrify (ves'tri-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. vestrified, ppr. vestrifying. [< vestry + -fy.] To make a vestry of, or make like a vestry; turn into a vestry. [Rare.]

In the debate in the House of Commons on the Redistribution of Seats Bill, Dec. 4, 1884, Mr. Chaplin said it would "tend to vestrify the House of Commons."
N. and Q., 6th ser., XI. 6.

★vestry (ves'tri), n.; pl. vestries (-triz). [< ME. vestrye, < OF. vestairie* (?), vestiaire, F. vestiaire, < L. vestiarium, a wardrobe: see vestiary. For the terminal form, cf. sextry.] 1. A room, or sometimes a separate building, attached to a church, where the vestments of the clergy, and sometimes the sacred vessels and other treasures of the church, are kept. Such an apartment is also called sacristy or vestry-room. It is now, in Anglican churches, generally under the same roof with the church, and is usually placed at one side of the chancel.

A vestry or sanctuary, on the Gospel side of the altar.
J. Fergusson, Hist. Arch., I. 426.

2. In non-liturgical churches, a room or building attached to a church, and used for the Sabbath-school, the weekly prayer-meetings, religious services, etc.; a chapel.—3. In Eng. eccles. law, and in Amer. colonial law: (a) A meeting of the inhabitants or ratepayers of a parish for the despatch of the official business of the parish. (b) A meeting or a board consisting of representatives of the ratepayers at large, all of whom are entitled to vote in their election. It is not essential to the validity of the meeting that it be held in the vestry, or even in connection with the church-building. The general charge of the church property is intrusted to the vestry, together with certain administrative duties respecting the parish, such as the care of the poor, and sometimes the paving and lighting of the streets, etc.

The farmers whom he met at vestry.
T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, i. 3.

4. In the Prot. Epis. Ch. in the United States of America, a committee (chosen annually by the members of the congregation) who, in conjunction with the churchwardens, manage its temporal affairs. The time and manner of electing the vestrymen, and their rights and duties, are different in different dioceses, being determined by diocesan regulations. The vestry has a general charge of the temporalities of the church, and, in the case of a vacancy in the pastorate, is the official representative of the parish; but it exercises no ecclesiastical control over the rector, either in his administration of the spiritual affairs of the church or in the conduct of its services. It nominates the rector of the parish, subject to the approval of the bishop.—Common vestry, an assembly of the ratepayers at large.—Select vestry, a board consisting of representatives of the ratepayers: sometimes called select vestry only when renewed by filling its own vacancies, and general vestry when filled by election by the ratepayers at large.

vestry-board (ves'tri-bōrd), n. Same as vestry, 3, 4.

vestry-clerk (ves'tri-klėrk), n. An officer chosen by the vestry, who keeps the parish accounts and books.

vestrydom (ves'tri-dum), n. [< vestry + -dom.] The system of the government of parishes by vestries.

Relieved from the incubus of omnipotent vestrydom.
Daily Telegraph, Jan. 8, 1886. (Encyc. Dict.) vestryman (ves'tri-man), n.; pl. vestrymen (-men). A member of a vestry.

vestry-room (ves'tri-röm), n. Same as vestry, 1.

vestu (ves'tū), a. [F., pp. of vestir, clothe: see vest, v.] In her., same as revestu.

vestural (ves'tūr-al), a. [< vesture + -al.] Pertaining or relating to vesture or dress.

The vestural Tissue . . . of woollen or other cloth which Man's Soul wears as its outmost wrappage and over-all. Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, i. 1.

vesture (ves'tūr), n. [< ME. vesture, < OF. vesture, vesteure, < ML. vestitura*, < L. vestire, clothe: see vest.] 1. Garments in general; especially, the dress or costume worn at one time by any person.

I am a maid, and as by my nature
And by my semblant and by vesture
Myn handes ben nat shapen for a knyf.

vetch (vech), n. [Also fitch, fetch (?) (see fitch[1]); < ME. veche, also feche, ficche, < OF. veche, vesse, later vesce, F. vesce = Sp. veza = It. vezza, veccia = OHG. wiccha, MHG. G. wicke = D. wikke = Sw. vicker = Dan. vikke, < L. vicia, vetch, = Gr. βικίον, vetch; akin to vincia, vinca, pervinca (see periwinkle[1]), < vincire (√ vic), bind; cf. bind = L. vitis, a vine, vimen, a pliant twig, < vi, bind: see vitis, vine, withy.] A plant of the genus Vicia; the tare. The species are mostly climbing herbs of moderate height; many of them are useful as wild or cultivated forage-plants. The common vetch, the species most largely cultivated, is V. sativa. (See tare[2].) V. peregrina is an annual grown in Italy; and V. Ervilia of the Mediterranean region, known as black bitter-vetch, is grown as a forage-plant on calcareous soils. V. tetrasperma, the lentil tare, is said to be better than the common vetch for sandy ground, and V. hirsuta, the tare-vetch, and V. calcarata approach it in value. The wood-vetch, V. sylvatica, the bush-vetch, V. sepium, and the tufted vetch, V. Cracca, are perennials useful in pastures. The common bean of Europe is of the vetch genus, V. Faba. (See bean[1].) The name is extended to some kindred plants of other genera.—Bastard hatchet-vetch, Biserrula Pelecinus, a diffuse leguminous herb, the only species of its genus, having linear pods, which are extremely flattened contrary to the valves, thus bearing two false keels which are sinuate-dentate.—Bastard vetch, a plant of the genus Phaca, sometimes included in Astragalus.—Bitter vetch. See bitter-vetch.—Bladder-vetch. Same as bastard vetch: the name referring to the inflated pods.—Bush vetch. See def.—Chickling vetch, an annual herb, Lathyrus sativus, extensively grown in southern Europe as a forage-plant and for its seeds, which are used like those of the chick-pea. Its cultivation has sometimes been prohibited, as its continuous use is said to induce paralysis of the legs in man and animals.—Grass vetch. See grass-vetch.—Hairy vetch. Same as tare-vetch.—Hatchet vetch. See hatchet-vetch.—Horse or horseshoe vetch, Hippocrepis comosa: so named from its curved pods, which were credited with drawing the shoes of horses that tread upon it: hence also called unshoe-the-horse. See Hippocrepis.—Kidney vetch. See kidney-vetch.—Licorice-vetch, a milk-vetch, Astragalus glycyphyllus, having a sweet root.—Milk vetch. See milk-vetch.—Sensitive joint-vetch, a plant of the genus Æschynomene. The pod is jointed, and the leaves in some species are sensitive.—Tare-vetch, the hairy vetch or tare, Vicia hirsuta.—Tufted vetch, Vicia Cracca, a species found in the northern Old World and eastern North America, climbing 2 or 3 feet high, and bearing clusters of blue flowers, turning purple. See def.—Wood-vetch. See def.

vetiver (vet'i-vėr), n. [= F. vétiver, vétyver (NL. vetiveria), < E. Ind. vitivayr (Littré), a name given to the roots of the plant.] The cuscus-grass, Andropogon squarrosus (A. muricatus), of India, the fibrous roots of which are made into tatties (see tatty[2]). The rootstock and rootlets have a strong persistent odor compared to myrrh, and yield vetiver-oil, of modern use in European perfumery. In India an infusion is used as a cooling medicine.

veto (vē'tō), n. [= F. veto, < L. veto, I forbid (see def.), 1st pers. pres. ind. act. of vetare, forbid, prohibit, oppose, hinder.] 1. In a constitutional government, the right vested in one branch of it to negative the determinations of another branch; specifically, the right, under constitutional restrictions, of the executive, as a king, a president, or a governor, to reject a bill passed by the legislature; also, the act of exercising this right. This power is often traced to the privilege enjoyed by the Roman tribunes of annulling or suspending any measures of the senate, decree of a magistrate, etc., the word veto (I forbid) having been at least occasionally used by the tribune in such a case. This power of the tribunes was properly called intercessio. The attempt on the part of Louis XVI. of France to exercise the veto assured to him by the Constitution of 1791 was one of the causes of the revolutionary movements of 1792, which at once dethroned the king and overturned the Constitution. In Great Britain the power of the crown is confined to a veto, a right of rejecting and not resolving, and even this right has become practically obsolete, the last occasion of its exercise being in the reign of William III. The Constitution of the United States provides that "every Bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it become a Law, be presented to the President of the United States. If he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it with his Objections to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the Objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such Reconsideration two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the Bill, it shall be sent, together with the Objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a Law. . . . If any Bill shall not be returned by the President within ten Days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the Same shall be a Law, in like Manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their Adjournment prevent its Return, in which Case it shall not be a Law." (Article I. Sec. 7.) Most of the State Constitutions have a similar provision.

A man who might be afraid to defeat a law by his single veto might not scruple to return it for re-consideration.
A. Hamilton, Federalist, No. 73.

Afterwards the veto message of President Jackson put an end to legislation upon local routes.
T. H. Benton, Thirty Years, I. 26.

Veto. By this expression (Lat. veto, 'I forbid') is understood in public law the constitutional right of the competent authority, or in republics of the whole people in their primary assembly, to protest against a legislative or administrative act, and to prevent wholly, or for the time being, the validation or execution of the same.
Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 206.

2. Any right or power of authoritatively forbidding or effectively negativing, or the exercise of such right or power; prohibition; interdict.

On George's intercourse with Amelia he put an instant veto.
Thackeray, Vanity Fair, xviii.

The rector had beforehand put a veto on any Dissenting chairman.
George Eliot, Felix Holt, xxiv.

Absolute veto, a veto without restrictions.—Liberum veto, in the former kingdom of Poland, the privilege enjoyed by a single member of the diet of invalidating any measure.—Pocket veto. See pocket.—Suspensory veto, a veto to which certain conditions are attached.—Veto Act, an act passed by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland in 1834, decreeing that no one should be admitted a minister of any vacant church if a majority of the male heads of families in full communion with the church should dissent from his appointment. The Court of Session, and subsequently the House of Lords (in 1839), declared this act of the assembly to be illegal; and the dissensions that consequently arose within the church culminated in the disruption of 1843.

From L. via are also ult. E. viaticum, voyage, convey, convoy, envoy, invoice, devious, deviate, pervious, impervious, obvious, previous, obviate, bivious, trivial, trivium, quadrivium, the first element in viaduct, etc.] 1. A highway; a road; a way or passage. The word is often used adverbially in the ablative case, with the meaning 'by way' (of being understood with the following noun): as, to send a letter via London (that is, by way of London); to go to Washington via Philadelphia.

2. In anat. and med., a natural passage of the body.—Per vias naturales, through the natural passages; in obstet., a phrase expressing the delivery of the fetus in the natural way.—Primæ viæ, the first or principal passages—that is, the alimentary canal; the bowels.—Via Lactea, in astron., the Milky Way, or Galaxy. See Galaxy.—Via media, the middle way; the mean between two extremes. The phrase has often been applied to a view of the position of the Anglican Church, which regards it as half-way between Romanism and Protestantism.

via[2] (vē′ä), interj. [It. via, come, come on, away, enough, etc., an exclamation of encouragement, impatience, etc., an elliptical use of via, way: see via[1].] Away! off! formerly a word of encouragement from commanders to their men, riders to their horses, etc., and also an expression of impatience, defiance, etc.

> "Via!" says the fiend; "away!" says the fiend; "for the heavens, rouse up a brave mind," says the fiend, "and run." Shak., M. of V., ii. 2. 11.

> Via for fate! fortune, lo, this is all;
> At grief's rebound I'll mount, although I fall!
> Middleton, Blurt, Master Constable, ii. 1.

viability (vī-ạ-bil′i-ti), n. [< F. viabilité; as viable + -ity.] 1. The state of being viable; capability of living; specifically, capability in the fetus of continued existence after removal from the womb. The necessary condition of viability is that the vital organs shall be sufficiently well formed to be able to perform their functions, a state reached when the fetus has attained the age of about seven months.

2. In nat. hist., the ability to live in certain conditions of environment, climatic, geographical, etc.: as, the viability of fish in the water; the viability of an imported plant or animal in a country.

viable (vī′ạ-bl), a. [< F. viable, < ML. vitabilis*, capable of life, < L. vita (> F. vie), life: see vital.] Capable of living; likely to live; specifically, capable of continued existence outside of the womb: noting a fetus. See viability, 1.

> Thanks to the couveuse and gavage, the time when the fœtus becomes viable may now be placed in the seventh month. Medical News, LII. 651.

viaduct (vī′a-dukt), n. [= F. viaduc = Sp. Pg. viaducto, < ML. viaductus, a viaduct, < L. via, road, way, + ductus, a leading: see via[1] and duct, and cf. aqueduct (L. aquæ ductus), with which viaduct seems to have been confused in form.] An extensive bridge, consisting strictly of a series of arches of masonry, erected for the purpose of conducting a road or a railway over a valley or a district of low level, or over existing channels of communication, where an embankment would be impracticable or inexpedient; more widely, any elevated roadway for which artificial constructions of timber, iron, bricks, or stonework are established. Compare aqueduct.

Viaduct.—Ancient Roman Aqueduct called the Pont du Gard, near Nimes, France; adapted as a viaduct for the modern highway.

viage†, n. An obsolete form of voyage.

vial (vī′al), n. [Formerly also viall, viol, violl, altered terminally to accord with the L. spelling and with phial; < ME. viole, fiole, fyole, < OF. viole, an irreg. variant of fiole, phiole (F. fiole), prop. fiale* = It. fiala, < L. phiala, ML. fiala, < Gr. φιάλη, a shallow cup or bowl, esp. a drinking-bowl or a bowl for libations, a patera, a cinerary urn. Cf. phial, a later form, after the L. spelling.] A vessel or bottle; especially, a small glass bottle used for holding liquids, and particularly liquid medicines. Also phial.

> The gobelotes of golde grauen aboute, > & fyoles fretted with flores & fleez of golde,
> Vpon that avter watz al aliche dresset.
> Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), ii. 1476.

> Upon my secure hour thy uncle stole,
> With juice of cursed hebenon in a vial,
> And in the porches of my ears did pour
> The leperous distilment. Shak., Hamlet, i. 5. 62.

> I never valued this ampulla, or vial, at less than eight crowns. B. Jonson, Volpone, ii. 1.

> To give me a proof of his art, he took a glass of fair water, and, by the infusion of three drops out of one of his phials, converted it into a most beautiful pale Burgundy. Addison, Tatler, No. 131.

Anaclastic vial. See anaclastic.—Leyden vial. Same as Leyden jar (which see, under jar[3]).—To pour out vials of wrath, to take vengeance; inflict judgment (Rev. xvi. 1); hence, colloquially, to become very angry; storm; rage.

> Wal, Miss S. doos hev cuttins-up and pourins-out o' vials,
> But then she hez her widder's thirds, an' all on us hez trials. Lowell, Biglow Papers, 2d ser., i.

vial (vī′al), v. t.; pret. and pp. vialed, vialled, ppr. vialing, vialling. [< vial, n.] 1. To put or keep in a vial, or as in a vial.

> She with precious viall'd liquours heals.
> Milton, Comus, l. 847.

2. To store up for punishment or vengeance: with reference to Rev. xvi. 1.

> Full on my fenceless head its phial'd wrath
> My fate exhaust. Shenstone, Love and Honour.

Also phial.

vialful (vī′al-fůl), n. [< vial + -ful.] As much as a vial will hold.

viameter (vī-am′e-tėr), n. [< L. via, way, + Gr. μέτρον, measure.] An instrument for measuring the distance traveled by a carriage by registering the revolutions made by a wheel connected with it; an odometer. Imp. Dict.

viand (vī′and), n. [< ME. viande, vyaunde*, < OF. viandé, F. viande, < ML. vivenda, also, after Rom., vivanda, (things) to be lived upon, neut. pl. gerundive of vivere, live: see vivid.] Food; victuals: used chiefly in the plural.

> As grete Wormes that men fynden there in Wodes, men maken Vyaunde Rialle, for the Kyng and for other grete Lordes. Mandeville, Travels, p. 193.

> Upon his board, once frugal, press'd a load
> Of viands rich, the appetite to goad.
> Crabbe, Works, V. 93.

viander† (vī′an-dėr), n. [< ME. viaundour, < OF. viandour*, < viande, viands: see viand.] 1. One who provides viands; a host.

> One that, to purchase the name of a sumptuous frankelen or a good viander, would bid diuerse ghests to a costlie and daintie dinner.
> Stanihurst, Descrip. of Ireland, iv. (Holinshed's [Chron., I.).

2. A feeder or eater. Cranmer.

viandry† (vī′and-ri), n. [< viand + -ry (see -ery).] Food; victuals; provisions; viands. J. Udall, On Luke xxiv.

vi-apple, n. See vi.

viary† (vī′a-ri), a. [< L. viarius, of or pertaining to roads or ways, < via, road, way: see via[1].] Of, pertaining to, or happening in roads or ways.

> In beasts, in birds, in dreams, and all viary omens.
> Feltham, Resolves, i. 96.

viatecture (vī′a-tek-tụ̈r), n. [< L. via, road, way, + -tecture as in architecture.] The art of constructing roads, bridges, railways, canals, etc. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.

viatic (vī-at′ik), a. [< L. viaticus, of or pertaining to a journey, < via, way, road: see via[1].] Of or pertaining to a journey or traveling.

viaticals (vī-at′i-kalz), n. pl. [Pl. of viatical*, < viatic + -al.] Things carried or taken along in traveling; baggage, especially military baggage; impedimenta. [Rare.]

> His [Cicero's] language, so admirable in everything else, was unfit for it; his back would have been bent, bowed down, and broken under the weight of armor and viaticals which Titus carried with him easily and far.
> Landor, Imag. Conv., Asinius Pollio and Licinius Calvus, ii.

viaticum (vī-at′i-kum), n. [= F. viatique = Sp. viático = Pg. It. viatico, < L. viaticum, provision or money for a journey, money made by a soldier in the wars, prize-money, LL. also money to pay the expenses of one studying abroad, also the eucharist given to a dying person; neut. of viaticus, pertaining to a journey: see viatic. Cf. voyage, a doublet of viaticum.] 1. Provision for a journey.

> A poor viaticum; very good gold, sir;
> But holy men affect a better treasure.
> Fletcher, Pilgrim, i. 2.

> The smallness of their viaticum and accommodation for their voyage. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 76.

2. In Rom. antiq., an allowance for the expenses of the journey, made to officers who were sent into the provinces to exercise any office or perform any service. Under the republic it had the form of transportation and supplies furnished by state contractors; under the empire it was a fixed payment of money.

3. The eucharist: in old usage generally, in modern usage exclusively, employed to designate it as given to a person in danger of death. According to Roman Catholic, Greek, etc., ecclesiastical law, such persons are allowed to receive the communion, even if they are not fasting, and they may do so again and again in the same illness if circumstances render it expedient. The viaticum is given by the parish priest, or by another priest deputed by him.

> She received the heavenly viaticum but the Sunday before, after a most solemn recollection.
> Evelyn, Diary, Sept. 9, 1678.

> Shall extreme unction, or other ghostly viaticum (to Louis, not to France), be administered?
> Carlyle, French Rev., I. i. 3.

4. A portable altar: so called because often taken to the bedside of the dying.

viator (vī-ā′tọr), n.; pl. viatores (vī-ạ-tō′rēz). [L. viator, a traveler, < viare, go, journey, < via, way: see way[1].] 1. A traveler; a wayfaring person.—2. In Rom. antiq., a servant who attended upon and executed the commands of certain Roman magistrates; a summoner or apparitor.

viatorially (vī-ạ-tō′ri-al-i), adv. [< viator + -ial + -ly[2].] As regards traveling. [Rare.]

> They are too far apart, viatorially speaking.
> Daily Telegraph, Sept. 29, 1885. (Encyc. Dict.) viatorian† (vī-ạ-tō′ri-ạn), a. Belonging to the way or to traveling. Blount.

vibex (vī′beks), n.; pl. vibices (vi-bī′sēz). [NL., < L. vibex (vibic-), the mark of a blow, a wale.] 1. In pathol., a large purple spot appearing under the skin in certain malignant fevers. They are also called molopes.—2. A hemorrhage beneath or into the skin, having the form of a line or long stripe.

vibracula, n. Plural of vibraculum.

vibracular (vī-brak′ū-lạr), a. [< vibracul(um) + -ar[3].] Of the nature of or pertaining to the vibracula of a polyzoan.

vibracularium (vī-brak-ū-lā′ri-um), n.; pl. vibraculania (-ạ). [NL., < vibracul(um) + -arium after avicularium, q. v.] In Polyzoa, same as vibraculum. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 132.

vibraculum (vī-brak′ū-lum), n.; pl. vibracula (-lạ). [NL., < L. vibrare, shake, agitate: see vibrate.] One of the long filamentous or flagelliform appendages of the cells or ectocysts of many polyzoans, usually articulated with short dilated processes of the ectocyst, and executing constant lashing movements by the contraction of muscles contained in their dilated bases; a flabellarium. These lashing organs are highly characteristic, like the snapping or beak-like organs with which some polyzoans are also provided. See avicularium.

v, four Vibracula of the Polyzoarium of a Polyzoan (Scrupocellaria ferox); a, articulation of the base of one of them. (Magnified.)

vibrant (vī′brant), a. [< F. vibrant = Sp. Pg. It. vibrante, < L. vibran(t-)s, ppr. of vibrare, vibrate: see vibrate.] 1. Vibrating; agitated; specifically, vibrating so as to produce sound: as, a vibrant string.

> Each man has his private barometer of hope, the mercury in which is more or less sensitive, and the opinion vibrant with its rise or fall. Lowell, Fireside Travels, p. 119.

So stirring and vibrant with commerce and speculation. The Century, XXVI. 828.

2. Of sounds, resonant; sonorous; characterized by a perceptible vibration; sometimes, tremulous.

Gaily the old man sang to the vibrant sound of his fiddle. Longfellow, Evangeline, i. 4.

Her eyes were brilliant, her glance was tender, . . . her voice was vibrant with feeling. C. D. Warner, Roundabout Journey, p. 8.

vibrate (vī′brāt), v.; pret. and pp. vibrated, ppr. vibrating. [< L. vibratus, pp. of vibrare (> It. vibrare = Sp. Pg. vibrar = F. vibrer), set in tremulous motion, move to and fro, brandish, shake; cf. Skt. √ vip, tremble.] I. intrans. 1. To swing; oscillate; move one way and the other; play to and fro, as the pendulum.

The government would vibrate between the two factions (for such will parties have become) at each successive election. Calhoun, Works, I. 42.

2. To have a periodic oscillatory motion under forces of restitution, commonly simply harmonic or compounded of simple harmonic motions.—3. To produce a vibratory or resonant effect; thrill; quiver: as, a whisper vibrates on the ear.

Stephen had the fibre of nobleness in him that vibrated to her appeal. George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, vi. 11.

4. To fluctuate or waver, as between two opinions.

II. trans. 1. To cause to move or wave to and fro; cause to swing or oscillate; hence, to throw with a vibratory motion; hurl.

That orator [Pericles] of whom (amongst so many that vibrated thunderbolts) it was said peculiarly that he thundered and lightened. De Quincey, Style, iii.

2. To affect with vibratory motion; cause to quiver: as, vibrated breath.—3. To measure or indicate by vibrating or oscillating: as, a pendulum vibrating seconds.

vibratile (vī′brā-til), a. [= F. vibratile; as vibrate + -ile.] Capable of vibrating; susceptible of being vibrated; vibratory: as, a vibratile organ; vibratile action or motion.—Vibratile antennæ, in entom., antennæ which are slender and constantly quivering or vibrating as the insect moves, as in the Ichneumonidæ and some other Hymenoptera.—Vibratile cell, a ciliated cell.—Vibratile epithelium, epithelium composed of ciliated cells.—Vibratile membrane. See membrane.

vibratility (vī-brā-til′i-ti), n. [< vibratile + -ity.] The property or state of being vibratile; ★disposition to vibration or oscillation.

vibration (vī-brā′shọn), n. [< F. vibration = Sp. vibración = Pg. vibração = It. vibrazione, < L. vibratio(n-), a shaking or brandishing, < vibrare, shake, vibrate: see vibrate.] 1. The act of vibrating; a movement to and fro; oscillation; hence, fluctuation in general: as, a vibration of opinion.

The late proceedings seem to be producing a decisive vibration in our favor. Jefferson, To James Madison, Correspondence, I. 300.

Like the great cords of a harp, in loud and solemn vibrations. Longfellow, Evangeline, ii. 4.

In Virginia there had been a great vibration of opinion. Bancroft, Hist. Const., II. 354.

2. In physics, an oscillating, reciprocating, or any kind of stationary motion made by a body, as a pendulum, musical cord, elastic plate, or mass of air, when forced from the position, figure, or volume of equilibrium, under the influence of forces of restitution. When the reciprocating movement is comparatively slow, as that of a pendulum, which is produced by the action of gravity on the whole mass of the body, the term oscillation is commonly used, while the term vibration is generally confined to a motion with rapid reciprocations or revolutions, as that of a sonorous body, which proceeds from the attractions (with perhaps some repulsions) of the molecules of the body on each other when a disturbance takes place in their state of equilibrium. In the case of a vibrating string or rod, the vibrations are distinguished as transverse or longitudinal, according to the direction of the oscillating movement relatively to the length of the sonorous body. The term vibration is also applied to the motion (generally an elliptical revolution) which is produced among the particles of a fluid or ethereal medium when their equilibrium is disturbed by any impulse, by which means waves or undulations are caused. In all cases one complete vibration means the double movement of the particle or vibrating body to and fro about the position of equilibrium, while the movement forward and backward on one side only is a half-vibration. The laws of vibratory motion form the foundation of the theories devised by modern science to account for the phenomena of acoustics and optics. See sound[5], and undulatory theory of light (under light[1], 1), also cuts under nodal and sonometer.

The phenomena of polarisation demonstrated . . . that the vibrations of light take place at right angles to the direction of the rays. Lommel, Light (trans.), p. 351.

3. In med., same as fremitus.—4. In nat. hist., movement to and fro, especially when quick, continuous, regular, and of little amplitude; a quivering or shivering motion; tremulousness; tremor: as, the vibration of aspen-leaves on their compressed petioles in the breeze; the vibration of the ear-drum under sound-waves; the vibration of a fly's wings in flight. The word is also somewhat specifically applied to ciliary action, or the motion of microscopic bodies, as cilia, flagella, vibracula, vibrios, spermatic filaments, and the like, vibration being the most obvious activity of such objects, and a usual means of locomotion, of ingestion of food, etc.—Amplitude of a simple vibration. See amplitude.—Amplitude of vibration, the maximum excursion or displacement of a vibrating body or particle from a position of rest.—Free vibration, a vibration whose period depends only upon the nature and form of the vibrating body: used in contradistinction to forced vibration, when the period is more or less modified by some outside influence, as the vibrations of a neighboring body of slightly different pitch.—Funipendulous vibration. See funipendulous.—Harmonic vibration. Same as simple harmonic motion (which see, under harmonic).—Lateral vibration. See lateral.—Period of vibration, the time between instants at which the displacement and velocity of the vibrating body are the same both in amount and in direction.—Phase of vibrations, the time elapsed at an assumed zero of time since the passage of the vibrating body through equilibrium divided by the complete period of vibration, this quotient being multiplied by 360°.

vibrational (vī-brā′shọn-ạl), a. [< vibration + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of vibration.

The vibrational impulse may be given as nearly as possible at the centre of the mass of air in the resonant box. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 242, note 1.

vibratiuncle (vī-brā′ti-ung-kl), n. [< NL. vibratiuncula*, dim. of L. vibratio(n-), vibration: see vibration.] A small vibration. Also vibratiuncule. See the quotation under vestigium.

The brain, not the spinal marrow or nerves, is the seat of the soul, as far as it presides over the voluntary motions. For the efficacy of the motory vibratiuncles depends chiefly on that part of them which is excited within the brain. Hartley, Theory of the Human Mind, i. § 3.

Hartley supposes that the vibrations excited by a sensory or other impression do not die away, but are represented by smaller vibrations, or vibratiuncles, the permanency and intensity of which are in relation with the frequency of repetition of the primary vibrations. Huxley, Animal Automatism.

vibratiunculation (vī-brā-ti-ung-kū-lā′shọn), n. [< NL. vibratiuncula* + -ation.] A little thrill, throb, or throe; a slight shudder; a vibratiuncle. Coues, Dæmon of Darwin (1885), p. 58. [Rare.]

vibrative (vī′brā-tiv), a. [< vibrate + -ive.] Vibrating; vibratory; causing vibration.

A vibrative motion. Newton.

vibrato (vē-brä′tō), n. [It., pp. of vibrare, vibrate: see vibrate.] A pulsating effect in vocal music produced by the rapid reiteration of emphasis on a tone, as if under the impulse of great emotion. Strictly, the vibrato is distinct from the tremolo, in that the latter involves a perceptible variation in pitch; but in common usage the terms are made ★synonymous.

vibrator (vī′brā-tọr), n. [< NL. vibrator, < L. vibrare, vibrate: see vibrate.] 1. In elect. or teleg., a reed the vibrations of which are made to open and close the electric circuit and hence transmit pulsatory currents; also, a reed acted on by pulsatory currents by means of an electromagnet, and hence made to respond to the vibrations of a corresponding reed sending these currents from a distance. See harmonic telegraph, under telegraph.—2. In the reed-organ, one of the reeds by which the tone is produced.—3. In printing, an inking-roller that has a vibrating as well as a rotary movement, which aids the distribution of ink on the inking-table of a cylinder-press.

vibratory (vī′brā-tọ-ri), a. [= F. vibratoire = Sp. Pg. vibratorio; as vibrate + -ory.] 1. Vibrating; consisting in or belonging to vibration or oscillation; vibrative.

Vibratory motion of solids, which is really a molecular disturbance, is absorbed by being transformed into other kinds of molecular motion, and so may finally be transferred to the ether. W. K. Clifford, Lectures, I. 246.

2. Causing vibration.

The smoothness of the oil, and the vibratory power of the salt, cause the sense we call sweetness. Burke, Sublime and Beautiful.

★Vibrio (vib′ri-ō), n. [NL. (Cohn), < L. vibrare, vibrate: see vibrate.] 1. A genus or form-genus of Schizomycetes or bacteria, by some authorities regarded as the same as Spirillum. They have cylindrical, curved, or spirally wound rigid cells, provided at each end with a cilium. They occur in infusions, on teeth, in sea-water, etc. (See Spirillum, Schizomycetes.) The genus is a very old one, having been characterized by O. F. Müller in 1786 as "elongate infusorians without external organs," and has included at times various minute animals which have nothing to do with it. See def. 3.

2. [l. c.; pl. vibrios or vibriones (vib′ri-ōz, vib-ri-ō′nēz).] A member of this genus; a vibrion; a motile bacterium.—3†. [l. c.] An animalcule like or mistaken for a bacterium, and misplaced in the genus Vibrio: an old name of some minute nematoids, as those species of Tylenchus which infest wheat and cause ear-cockles.

vibrion (vib′ri-on), n.; pl. vibriones (vib-ri-ō′-nēz). [< F. vibrion, < NL. vibrio(n-): see Vibrio.] One of the microscopic motile filaments which may be developed in organic infusions; a vibrio; a motile bacterium. See Vibrio, 1.

Vibrionidæ (vib-ri-on′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Vibrio(n-) + -idæ.] A family of microscopic organisms, named from the genus Vibrio, and including some minute nematoid worms which were confounded with certain microbes. See Vibrio, 3. Also called Vibrionia and Vibrionina, and referred to the Infusoria, as by Ehrenberg and by Dujardin.

vibrionine (vib′ri-ọ-nin), a. [< vibrion + -ine.] Pertaining to or resembling vibrios.

vibrissa (vī-bris′ạ), n.; pl. vibrissæ (-ē). [NL., < L. vibrissa, usually in pl. vibrissæ, the hairs in the nostrils.] 1. In mammal., one of the long, stiff bristles which grow upon the upper lip and elsewhere upon the head of most mammals; a whisker, as of a cat. They are tactile organs, or feelers, and are sometimes called tactile hairs (pili tactiles). There is a popular notion that the whiskers reach out just far enough on each side to enable the animal to judge whether a hole or other close passage is large enough for it to pass through, and very probably this is true in many cases. See cuts under mouse, ocelot, panther, serval, tiger, and tiger-cat.

2. In ornith., a rictal bristle; one of the special set of long, slender, bristle-like or bristly feathers, devoid of vexilla proper, which grow in a series along each side of the rictus or gape of the mouth of many birds, as flycatchers, goatsuckers, and others. When very long, as in the goatsucker, they are sometimes called vibrissæ pectinatæ, and may have lateral filaments, as in the chuck-will's-widow. The use of the vibrissæ is supposed to be to entangle the legs and wings of insects, and thus diminish or prevent their struggling when caught, as the bristles are observed to be specially well developed in insectivorous birds which take their prey on the wing. See cuts under Platyrhynchus, flycatcher, goatsucker, and whippoorwill.

3. In human anat., one of the hairs which grow in the nostrils.—4. In entom., one of the projecting lateral bristles on the upper border of the peristomium or mouth-cavity of certain Diptera.

vibroscope (vī′brọ-skōp), n. [< L. vibrare, vibrate, + Gr. σκοπεῖν, view.] An instrument for observing, or for registering, vibrations.

Viburnum (vī-bėr′num), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. viburnum, the wayfaring-tree.] 1. A genus of plants, of the family Caprifoliaceæ, type of the tribe Viburneæ. It resembles the related genus Sambucus, the elder, in its corymbose or thyrsoid inflorescence, but is distinguished by the absence of any pinnately parted leaves. There are about 100 species, natives of the northern hemisphere and of the Andes, with a few species elsewhere in the southern hemisphere and in Madagascar. They are shrubs or small trees, usually with opposite branchlets and large naked buds. The leaves are petioled and opposite, or rarely whorled in threes; they are entire, serrate or dentate, rarely lobed. The white or pinkish corymbs of flowers are somewhat umbelled or panicled, and are axillary or terminal; the flowers are usually wheel-shaped, with five equal lobes, and a one- to three-celled ovary becoming in fruit a dry or fleshy ovoid or globose drupe usually one-celled and containing a single compressed and deeply furrowed seed. The fruit is edible but insipid in V. Lentago, acid in V. Opulus, astringent in others, in which it is said, however, to be edible after fermentation, and to have been made into cakes by the North American Indians. In several species, forming the section Opulus (also peculiar in its scaly buds), the marginal flowers, of a broad flat inflorescence, are enlarged and sterile. (See cuts under hobble-bush and neutral, and compare guelder-rose and snowball.) In the five other sections the flowers are all alike, and the winter buds, unlike most plants of temperate regions, are without scales. In a few Himalayan and Chinese species (the section Solenotinus) the flowers are tubular, elongated, and panicled, and in a few others funnelform. Three species occur in Europe, Flowering Branch of Arrow-wood (Viburnum acentatum). a, flowers; b, fruits.

of which V. Tinus is the laurustinus, a winter-flowering shrub of southern Europe, in Corsica forming large forests, often cultivated for its ornamental evergreen leaves, white blossoms, and dark-blue berries. V. Opulus, the cranberry-tree or high cranberry, in England also known as white dogwood, marsh- or water-elder, and gaiter-tree, is widely diffused through the north of both continents; in Norway it is used for the manufacture of small wooden articles, of spirits, and of a yellow dye. For the other European species, V. Lantana, see wayfaring-tree. About 20 species occur within the United States: 12 in the northeast; the others in the southern and western States. V. ellipticum occurs near the Pacific, V. densiflorum and V. obovatum near the South Atlantic coast; V. pauciflorum in Alaska and southward. Two American species, V. Lentago and V. prunifolium, become small trees. The bark of several species is used in the United States as a domestic remedy, and the inner bark of V. Lantana is esteemed a vesicant in England. A beverage known as Appalachian tea is sometimes made from the leaves of V. cassinoides, an early-flowering, thick-leafed species of American swamps. Several species are known as arrow-wood, chiefly V. dentatum in the north, V. molle in the south, V. ellipticum in California. The species are somewhat widely known by the generic name, especially V. acerifolium, the maple-leafed viburnum, or dockmackie. The sweet viburnum is V. Lentago (for which see sheepberry). V. cassinoides is known as withe-rod, V. prunifolium as black haw or stag-bush, and V. alnifolium as hobble-bush or American wayfaring-tree. The preceding are among the most ornamental of native American shrubs, admired for their white flowers, usually compact habit, and handsome foliage, also for their fruit, a bright blue-black in V. prunifolium, V. pubescens, and V. acerifolium, blue in V. dentatum and V. molle, and bright-red in V. Opulus; that of V. Lantana is an orange-red turning dull-black. Garden varieties produced by cultivation from V. Opulus are the snowball, or guelder-rose, and the rose-elder. V. rigidum of the Canaries, V. plicatum of northern China, and V. cotinifolium of Nepal, are also ornamental shrubs.

★2. [l. c.] A plant of this genus.

vicar (vik'ăr), n. [Early mod. E. also vicker; < ME. vicar, viker, vicair, vicaire (also vicary, q. v.), < OF. (and F.) vicaire = Sp. Pg. It. vicario, < L. vicarius, substituted, delegated, as a noun a substitute, a deputy, vicegerent, vicar, proxy, < vix* (vic-), found only in oblique cases (gen. vicis, etc.) and pl. vices, change, interchange: see vice[4].] 1. A person deputed or authorized to perform the functions of another; a substitute in office: as, the Pope claims to be vicar of Jesus Christ on earth.

> He hath thee [the Virgin] maked vicaire and maistresse > Of al the world. Chaucer, A. B. C., l. 140.

> Consider also the presence of the king's majesty, God's high vicar in earth.
> Latimer, 6th Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1549.

> Antichrist wee know is but the Devil's Vicar.
> Milton, On Def. of Humb. Remonst.

2. In Eng. eccles. law, the priest of a parish the tithes of which belong to a chapter or religious house, or to a layman, and who receives only the smaller tithes or a salary. The title is also now given to incumbents who would formerly have been known as perpetual curates (see curate).

> Ye persons and vickers that haue cure and charge,
> Take hede to the same, and roue not at large.
> Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 354.

> All Rectors and Vickers of the same deanery (Bristol).
> English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 287.

The distinction therefore of a parson and vicar is this: the parson has for the most part the whole right to all the ecclesiastical dues in his parish; but a vicar has generally an appropriator over him, entitled to the best part of the profits, to whom he is in effect perpetual curate, with a standing salary. Blackstone, Com., I. xi.

3. In the Rom. Cath. Ch., an ecclesiastic assisting a bishop and exercising jurisdiction in his name. He cannot perform acts properly belonging to the episcopate nor collate to benefices without special authority.—Cardinal vicar, an ecclesiastical dignitary in Rome who, as delegate of the Pope, performs his functions as local bishop of the diocese of Rome.—Lay vicar, clerk vicar, secular vicar. See lay[4].—Vicar apostolic, in Rom. Cath. usage, formerly, a bishop, archbishop, or other ecclesiastic to whom the Roman pontiff delegated a portion of his jurisdiction; now, a missionary or titular bishop stationed either in a country where episcopal sees have not yet been established or in one where the succession of Roman Catholic bishops has been interrupted.—Vicar choral, in the Ch. of Eng., an assistant of the canons or prebendaries in such parts of public worship as are performed in the chancel or choir, especially in connection with the music. They may be either clergymen or laymen.

> In all cathedrals of the old foundation in England, in St. David's, and in twelve Irish cathedrals, the Vicars Choral form a distinct corporation, the members of which vary in number from twelve to three: these corporations are distinct from the chapter as regards property, but in subjection to it as to the performance of the services.
> Grove, Dict. Music, IV. 260.

Vicar forane, in Rom. Cath. usage, an ecclesiastical dignitary appointed by the bishop to exercise a limited jurisdiction in a particular town or district of his diocese. The office is analogous to that of rural dean.—Vicar-general, in the Ch. of Eng., an ecclesiastical officer who assists a bishop or archbishop in the discharge of his office. The vicar-general of a bishop is his chancellor.

> For He that is the Formere principal > Hath maked me [Nature] his vicaire-general
> To forme and peynten erthely creaturis.
> Chaucer, Physician's Tale, l. 20.

> And I also find that the following Vicars General or Chancellors to the Bishops of Norwich exercised this power of Instituting without special powers in their patents so to do. Rev. T. Tanner (Ellis's Lit. Letters, p. 331).

> The very first act of the new supreme Head of the Church of England was to appoint a layman as his Vicar-general. Nineteenth Century, XXVI. 829.

Vicar of (Jesus) Christ, a title assumed by the Pope with reference to his claim to stand in the place of Jesus Christ and possess his authority in the church.—Vicar pensionary, in the Ch. of Eng., a clergyman appointed at a fixed stipend to serve a church the tithes of which belong to a collegiate foundation.

vicarage (vik'ăr-āj), n. [< vicar + -age.] 1. The benefice of a vicar.

vicarate (vik'ăr-āt), n. [< vicar + -ate[3]. Cf. vicariate[2].] 1. The office or jurisdiction of vicar; the territory presided over by a vicar; a vicariate.—2. A number of convents united together under the supervision of a custos or vicar, but too few to constitute a province. Encyc. Brit.

vicaress (vik'ăr-es), n. [< vicar + -ess.] A female vicar; the wife of a vicar.

> Mother Austin was afterwards Vicaress several years.
> Archæologia, XXVIII. 198.

vicarial (vī-kā'ri-al), a. [< L. vicarius, substituted, vicarious (see vicar, vicarious), + -al.] 1. Vicarious; delegated; substituted.

> All deriv'd and vicarial power.
> Blackwall, Sacred Classics, II., Pref., p. xxix.

> It has occurred to me, when weary and vexed I have myself gone to bed like a heathen, that another has asked forgiveness for my day, and safety for my night. I don't suppose such vicarial piety will avail much.
> Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, vii.

2. Pertaining to a vicar.

> The tithes of many things, as wood in particular, are in some parishes rectorial, and in some vicarial, tithes.
> Blackstone, Com., I. xi.

3. Holding the office of, or acting as, a vicar.

> A resident pastor, either rectorial or vicarial, either an incumbent or a substitute. V. Knox, Sermons, VI. xxvi.

vicarian (vī-kā'ri-an), n. [< LL. vicarianus, of or pertaining to a deputy, < L. vicarius, a deputy: see vicar.] A substitute; a vicar.

> Shall Balbus, the demure Athenian,
> Dream of the death of next vicarian?
> Marston, Scourge of Villainy, iii. 134.

vicariate[1] (vī-kā'ri-āt), a. [< L. vicarius, delegated (see vicar, vicarious), + -ate[1].] Having delegated power; pertaining to such authority and privilege as a vicar has.

vice[3] (vīs), n. [< vice-, prefix, in the words concerned.] A vice-chairman, vice-president, or other substitute or deputy, the principal or primary officer being indicated by the context.

> The governor . . . was a more imposing personage than his Vice, and was robed in character with his greater pretensions. R. Tomes, Americans in Japan, p. 157.

> The company . . . within a quarter of an hour were all seated in the great room of the Blue Lion Inn, Muggleton — Mr. Dumkins acting as chairman, and Mr. Luffey officiating as vice. Dickens, Pickwick, vii.

vice[4] (vī'sē), prep. [< L. vice, in the place (of), instead (of) (followed by a genitive), abl. of vix,* gen. vicis, etc., change, alternation, akin to Gr. εἴκειν, yield, AS. wican, etc., yield: see weak, wick[1], wicker.] In the place of; instead of: a Latin noun used in a position which gives it, as transferred to English, the effect of a preposition governing the following noun: as, Lieutenant A is gazetted as captain, vice Captain B promoted.

vice- (vīs). [< vice[4]. Hence vice[3]. This prefix appears as vis-, formerly also vi-, in viscount.] A prefix denoting, in the word compounded with it, one who acts in place of another, or one who is second in rank: as, vice-president, vice-chancellor. It is sometimes used alone as a noun, the word for which it stands being indicated by the context. Vice- in some cases indicates a deputy appointed by the principal officer or authority, and receiving his power by delegation, as in the case of a viceroy or vicegerent; and in other cases it indicates an alternative officer, alternate, or substitute appointed or elected by the same power as the primary officer, and receiving his power not by delegation, but directly in the same manner as the primary officer, and having no power to act in place of the primary officer except in case of a vacancy or, it may be, absence or disability, in which case he acts not under the direction of the primary officer, but independently as a substitute. This is the nature of the office of vice-president or vice-chairman.

vice-admiral (vīs-ad'mi-ral), n. A degree of the rank of admiral. See admiral, 2.

> The vice-admiral in the middle of the fleet, with a great squadron of gallies, struck sail directly.

Vicia (vis'i-ä), n. [NL. (Rivinus, 1691), < L. vicia, a vetch: see vetch.] A genus of leguminous plants, the vetches, of the family Fabaceæ, type of the tribe Vicieæ. It is characterized by a stamen-tube oblique at the apex, an ovary with many (rarely with two) ovules, and a style which is mostly filiform and more or less beaked, usually with a terminal dorsal tuft. About 200 species have been described, of which probably not over 120 are well defined. They are widely distributed through north temperate regions and South America; one species, V. sativa, long cultivated, is now naturalized within the southern hemisphere in the old world. They are chiefly tendril-climbers, rarely spreading herbs, or somewhat erect. The flowers are usually blue, violet, or yellowish. The fruit is a compressed two-valved pod with globose seeds. The species are known in general as vetch. V. sativa is cultivated in the old world as a fodder-crop, also under the names of fitches, tares, and lints; 16 or more other species are also useful for forage. (See tare[2].) Several species are valued for their seeds, especially V. Faba, the horse-bean of old world cultivation (for which see Faba, bean[1], Mazagan). V. gigantea, a tall, robust purple-flowered climber growing from San Francisco to Sitka, produces seeds which when young resemble green peas in size and taste. Nine species are natives of England, 72 of Europe, about 10 in the United States, besides a few in Mexico; 3 species (mentioned under tare) are locally naturalized in the United States; 3 only are native to the Central States, of which V. Americana (see pea-vine, 2 (b)) extends west, V. Cracca north, and V. Caroliniana east; the last, the Carolina vetch, is a delicate plant with graceful secund racemes of small lavender flowers; V. Cracca, the tufted vetch, or cow-vetch, is also native in the old world, and is much admired for its densely flowered racemes, which are first blue, and turn purple. See cuts under Faba, mucronulate, plumule, 3, pod, and vetch.

viciate†, v. t. An obsolete spelling of vitiate. Sir T. More, Works, p. 636.

Vicieæ (vi-sī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bronn, 1822), < Vicia + -eæ.] A tribe of leguminous plants, of the family Fabaceæ; the vetch tribe. It is characterized by a herbaceous stem, leaves abruptly pinnate, continued into a simple or branching tendril or bristle, and with their leaflets commonly minutely toothed at the apex. Their stipules are usually foliaceous, oblique, or half-sagittate; their flowers axillary and few, solitary or racemed; their seeds with a funiculus expanded above, the cotyledons thick and fleshy and not appearing above the ground in germination. The 6 genera include most of the plants known as pea and vetch—the genera Cicer, Lentula, and Pisum belonging to the old world, Vicia (the type), Lathyrus, and Abrus also to the new.

vicinage (vis'i-nāj), n. [Formerly also voisinage (the form vicinage being made to agree with vicinity, etc.); < OF. voisinage, veisinage, F. voisinage, neighborhood, < veisin, F. voisin, near, neighboring, < L. vicinus, near, neighboring: see vicine, and cf. vicinity.] 1. The place or places adjoining or near; neighborhood; vicinity.

That soul that makes itself an object to sin, and invites an enemy to view its possessions, and live in the vicinage, loves the sin itself. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 109.

The Protestant gentry of the vicinage.

In which respect it may come to passe that what the Grammarian setteth downe for a viciositee in speach may become a vertue and no vice.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 129.

vicious (vish'us), a. [Formerly also vitious; < ME. vicious, < OF. vicious, vitious, vicieus, F. vicieux = Pr. vicios = Sp. Pg. vicioso = It. vizioso, < L. vitiosus, faulty, vicious, < vitium, fault, vice: see vice[1].] 1. Characterized by vice or imperfection; faulty; defective.

Some vicious mole of nature. Shak., Hamlet, i. 4. 24.

Their [the logicians'] form of induction . . . is utterly vicious and incompetent.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

If a creature be self-neglectful, and insensible of danger, or if he want such a degree of passion in any kind as is useful to preserve, sustain, or defend himself, this must certainly be esteem'd vitious, in regard of the design and end of Nature. Shaftesbury, Inquiry, II. i. § 3.

Mannerism is pardonable, and is sometimes even agreeable, when the manner, though vicious, is natural.
Macaulay, Boswell's Johnson.

2. Addicted to vice; habitually transgressing moral law; depraved; profligate; wicked.

Happy the Roman state, where it was lawful,
If our own sons were vicious, to choose one
Out of a virtuous stock, though of poor parents,
And make him noble. Fletcher, Spanish Curate, i. 3.

Wycherley . . . appears to have led, during a long course of years, that most wretched life, the life of a vicious old boy about town.
Macaulay, Comic Dramatists of the Restoration.

"I know his haunts, but I don't know his friends, Pendennis," the elder man said. "I don't think they are vicious so much as low." Thackeray, Philip, v.

For which cause Richard Iohnson caused the English, by his vicious liuing, to bee worse accounted of then the Russes. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 391.

Every vicious action must be self-injurious and ill.
Shaftesbury, Inquiry, II. ii., Conclusion.

When vicious passions and impulses are very strong, it is idle to tell the sufferer that he would be more happy if his nature were radically different from what it is.
Lecky, Europ. Morals, I. 63.

4. Impure; foul; vitiated: as, vicious humors. —5. Faulty; incorrect; not pure; corrupt: as, a vicious style.

Whatsoeuer transgressed those lymits, they counted it for vitious; and thereupon did set downe a manner of regiment in all speech generally to be obserued, consisting in sixe pointes.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 130.

It is a vicious use of speech to take out a substantive kernel from its content and call that its object.
W. James, Prin. of Psychology, I. 275.

6. Not well broken or trained; given to objectionable tricks: said of an animal.

He was, in fact, noted for preferring vicious animals, given to all kinds of tricks, which kept the rider in constant risk of his neck. Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 439.

7. Characterized by severity; virulent; malignant; spiteful: as, a vicious attack. [Colloq.] —Vicious circle. See circle.—Vicious intromission. See intromission, 3.—Vicious syllogism, a fallacy or sophism.—Vicious union, the knitting of the two fragments of a broken bone in such a way as to cause deformity of the limb or marked interference with its function.

=Syn. 2 and 3. Wicked, Depraved, etc. (see criminal), unprincipled, licentious, profligate.—6. Refractory, ugly.

vicissitude (vi-sis'i-tūd), n. [= F. vicissitude = Sp. vicisitud = Pg. vicissitude, < L. vicissitudo, change, < vicissim, by turns, < vix* (vic-), change: see vice[4].] 1. Regular change or succession of one thing to another; alternation.

God created them equall, but by this it came to passe that the vicissitude or intercourse of day and night was vncertaine. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 260.

Grateful vicissitude, like day and night.
Milton, P. L., vi. 8.

2. A passing from one state or condition to another; irregular change; revolution; mutation: as, the vicissitudes of fortune.

But it is not good to look too long upon these turning wheels of vicissitude, lest we become giddy.
Bacon, Vicissitudes of Things (ed. 1887).

His whole life rings the changes—hot and cold, in and out, off and on, to and fro: he is peremptory in nothing but in vicissitudes. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 505.

As long as there are Men, there must be malignant Humours, there must be Vices, and vicissitudes of Things.
Howell, Letters, I. vi. 45.

Sometimes 'tis grateful to the rich to try
A short vicissitude, and fit of poverty.
Dryden, tr. of Horace's Odes, I. xxix. 23.

But vicissitudes so extraordinary as those which marked the reign of Charles the Second can only be explained by supposing an utter want of principle in the political world.
Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

The whirlpool of political vicissitude, which makes the tenure of office generally so fragile.
Hawthorne, Scarlet Letter, Int., p. 12.

vicissitudinary (vi-sis-i-tū'di-nā-ri), a. [< L. vicissitudo (-din-), vicissitude, + -ary.] Subject to vicissitudes; exhibiting or characterized by a succession of changes; vicissitudinous.

We say . . . the days of man [are] vicissitudinary, as though he had as many good days as ill.
Donne, Devotions, p. 313.

vicissitudinous (vi-sis-i-tū'di-nus), a. [< L. vicissitudo (-din-), vicissitude, + -ous.] Characterized by or subject to a succession of changes; vicissitudinary.

Vicissy duck. [< Vicissy, a local name (cf. Sp. vicicilin, a humming-bird), + E. duck[2].] The widow-duck. Simmonds.

Vicksburg group. In geol., a division of the Tertiary, of importance in the Gulf States from Florida west to Mississippi. The name Vicksburg was given by Conrad, who referred this group to the Oligocene, a reference which has been confirmed by Heilprin, who, however, prefers the name Orbitoidal, given with reference to the great abundance of Orbitoides Mantelli, the most distinctive fossil of these beds.

vicontiel† (vī-kon′ti-el), a. [Also vicountiel; < OF. (AF.) vicontiel*, < viconte, sheriff, viscount: see viscount.] In old Eng. law, pertaining to the sheriff or viscount.—Vicontiel rents, certain farm-rents paid by the sheriff to the king. By 3 and 4 William IV., c. 99, such farms were placed under the management of the commissioners of the woods and forests.—Vicontiel writs, writs triable in the county or sheriff court.

victoress (vik′tor-es), n. [< victor + -ess.] A female who is victorious; a victress.

Victoria (vik-tō′ri-ä), n. [< L. victoria: see victory.] 1. The twelfth planetoid, discovered by Hind in London in 1850.—2. [NL. (Lindley, 1837), named after Queen Victoria of England, to whom the first flower which blossomed in cultivation was presented in 1849.] A genus of water-lilies, belonging to the family Nymphæaceæ and to the subfamily Nymphæeæ. It is characterized by an inferior ovary, upon which all the parts of the flower are inserted, and by sterile inner stamens. The only species, V. Amazonica, is known as the Victoria or royal water-lily, in Victoria Water-lily (Victoria Amazonica).

Guiana (from the leaves) as irupe or water-platter, and sometimes as water-maize, from the use of the roasted seeds. The plant is an inhabitant of still waters from Paraguay to Venezuela, growing chiefly in secondary tributaries of the Amazon system. It produces a thick rootstock from which radiate long-petioled circular leaves, each often 6 feet across (sometimes 12), with an upturned rim about 3 inches high. Each leaf resembles a shallow circular floating tray, and is conspicuously marked with a network of depressed veins, between which the surface is swollen into slight quadrangular elevations resembling alligator-skin, which gradually disappear with age. The leaves are deep-green above, the under surface pink, and are set with strong, sharp, conical spines, which also clothe the petioles, peduncles, and ovary. The leaves are very strong; a single one has borne the weight of two men. A plant may produce as many as twelve leaves at once, filling a tank 20 to 40 feet across. The solitary floating flower is from 12 to 14 inches in diameter (sometimes 24), expanding at night white and fragrant, closing by day, and expanding for the last time the second evening. In one variety it is rose-color at the second expansion, but with the odor unpleasant, and partially expands a third time, then still deeper red, afterward withdrawing beneath the surface; in a third variety there is a sharp and beautiful contrast between outer white and central deep rose-red petals. Some have considered these distinct species. The flower consists of four sepals, numerous petals in many rows, the outer larger than the sepals, the inner gradually passing into the numerous stamens which follow in many circles, at first petaloid and broad with small anthers, the innermost differently formed and sterile. The numerous carpels are sunk within a dilated torus, and produce albuminous edible seeds resembling peas. The plant was first discovered in Bolivia by Hænke, 1801; it first flowered in England in November, 1849, and in the United States in 1853. Compared with other water-lilies, the flowers most resemble those of Castalia, and the leaves those of Euryale. 3. [l. c.] A form of low, light, four-wheeled carriage, having a calash top, with seats for two

No less renown'd than War. Milton, Sonnets, xi.

3. A female deity of the Greeks and Romans, the personification of success in battle or in any active struggle. She is represented as a winged woman, often bearing as attributes a palm-branch and laurel crown, or a trumpet. The subject is a very frequent one in ancient art, from some of the noblest of antique sculpture down to vase-paintings and figurines. Among the most notable examples are the reliefs from the balustrade of the temple of Wingless Victory at Athens, one of which is the well-known figure entitled "Victory Loosing her Sandal," and the magnificent statue called the "Victory of Samothrace," a Greek original of the fourth century B. C., attributed to the school of Scopas, found in the island of Samothrace, where it stood on a pedestal representing the prow of a trireme, and now one of the chief ornaments of the Louvre Museum. See Nike, cut in next column, and cut under Peloponnesian.

I observed some ancient reliefs at this village [Ertesy], particularly three victories, holding three festoons under three heads, on a marble coffin, with imperfect Greek inscriptions under them.

vidame (vē-däm′), n. [F., < ML. vice-dominus, as vice- + dominus.] In French feudal jurisprudence, the lieutenant or deputy of a bishop in temporal matters; also, a minor title of French feudal nobility.

A Vidame was originally the Judge of a Bishops Temporal Jurisdiction, or such an Officer to him as the Vicount was to the Count or Earl, but in process of time, of an Officer, he became a Lord, by altering his Office into a Fief, held of the Bishoprick he belonged to.
Blount, Glossographia (1670).

vide (vī′dē). [L., impv. 2d pers. sing. of videre, see: see vision.] See: a word indicating reference to something stated elsewhere: as, vide ante, 'see before'; vide supra, 'see above' (that is, in a previous place in the same book); vide post, 'see after'; vide infra, 'see below' (that is, in a subsequent place); quod vide, which see (usually abbreviated q. v.).

vidée (vē-dā′), a. In her., same as voided.

videlicet (vi-del′i-set), adv. [L., for videre licet, it is permitted to see: videre, see; licet, it is permitted: see vision and license. Cf. scilicet.] To wit; that is; namely: abbreviated to viz., which is usually read 'namely.'

Numberless are the Changes she'll dance thro', before she'll answer this plain Question; videlicet, Have you deliver'd my Master's Letter to your Lady?
Steele, Conscious Lovers, iii. 1.

Videlicet is used in law pleadings to point out in connection with a clause immediately preceding a specification which, if material, goes to sustain the pleading generally, and, if immaterial, may be rejected as surplusage. . . . It is the office of a videlicet to restrain or limit the generality of the preceding words, and in some instances to explain them. F. Wharton.

vide-ruff†, n. An old card-game.

Faith, let it be Vide-ruffe, and let's make honours.
Heywood, Woman Killed with Kindness (Works, 1874, II. [122).

Videstrelda (vid-es-trel′dä), n. [NL. (Lafresnaye, 1850), < Vid(ua) + Estrelda.] A genus of Viduinæ, detached from Vidua for the wire-tailed veuves or whidah-birds, which have in the male the four middle tail-feathers wire-shafted with a racket at the end: later called Tetrænura (Reichenbach, 1861). The type and only species is V. regia, of South Africa, through the Transvaal to the Zambesi, and in the west to Damaraland. This is the veuve de la côte d'Afrique and veuve à quatre brins of early French ornithologists, the shaft-tailed bunting of Latham (1783), the Vidua regia of most writers. The male is 12 inches long, of which length the middle tail-feathers form three fourths or more; the color is black, varied with white, gray, brown, and buff; the bill and feet are coral-red. See cut in preceding column.

vidette (vi-det′), n. Same as vedette.

Vidian (vid′i-an), a. [< Vidius (see def.) + -an.] Relating or dedicated to the Italian anatomist Guido Guidi, Latinized Vidius (16th century): specifically applied in anatomy to several parts. —Vidian artery, a branch of the internal maxillary artery which traverses the Vidian canal to be distributed to the Eustachian tube and the top of the larynx.—Vidian canal, nerve, plexus. See the nouns.—Vidian foramen. Same as Vidian canal.

vidimus (vid′i-mus), n. [So called from this word indorsed on the papers: L. vidimus, 'we have seen,' 1st pers. pl. perf. ind. of videre, see: see vision.] 1. An examination or inspection: as, a vidimus of accounts or documents.—2. An abstract or syllabus of the contents of a document, book, or the like.

vidonia (vi-dō′ni-ä), n. [Cf. Pg. vidonho, a vine-branch (cf. videira, a vine), < vide, a vine-branch, = Sp. vid, a vine, = It. vite, a vine, < L. vitis, a vine.] A dry wine from the Canary Islands, formerly much in fashion in England.

Vidua (vid′ū-ä), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1800), as if < L. vidua, a widow, tr. F. veuve, widow, widow-bird; Pg. viuva. The E. widow-bird, taken as the original, has been supposed to be a corruption of whidah-bird; but the reverse may be true.] An African genus of the family Ploceidæ, giving name to the Principal Whidah-bird (Vidua principalis), male.

Viduinæ; the veuves, widow-birds, or whidah-birds. No type having been originally indicated, the name is practically conterminous with Viduinæ in a narrow sense, and has been variously restricted by different writers, notably to V. principalis and V. (Videstrelda) regia. The former of these has in the male the four middle tail-feathers immensely lengthened and wide throughout their length (not wire-shafted). It was originally described (and figured) by Edwards in 1760 as the long-tailed sparrow, by Brisson in the same year as la veuve d'Angola, by Linnæus in 1766 as Emberiza vidua, E. principalis, and E. serena, by Latham in 1783 as the long-tailed, variegated, and Dominican bunting, and by Cuvier in 1817 as Vidua principalis. The male is 10 inches long, of which length the ample middle tail-feathers make two thirds or more, the rest of the tail being scarcely 2 inches, and the wing being only 3; the color is black and white, chiefly massed in large areas, and varied with some buff and gray. The female lacks the extraordinary development of the tail, being scarcely 5 inches long, and is also quite different in color from the male. This bird is widely distributed in Africa. A second species is V. hypocherina (or splendens) of the Zanzibar district. For V. regia, see Videstrelda; and for other forms, see Viduinæ.

viduage (vid′ū-āj), n. [< L. vidua, a widow (see widow), + -age.] The condition of a widow; widowhood; widows collectively.

vidual† (vid′ū-al), a. [< L. vidualis, of or pertaining to a widow, < vidua, a widow: see widow.] Of, pertaining, or relating to the state of a widow. Jer. Taylor, Holy Living, ii. 3.

viduate (vid′ū-āt), n. [< L. viduatus, pp. of viduare, widow: see viduation.] Eccles., the office or position of one of the order of widows; the order itself.

viduation (vid-ū-ā′shon), n. [< L. viduatus, pp. of viduare, bereave, widow, < vidua, a widow, viduus, widowed: see widow.] The state of being widowed; bereavement.

Viduinæ (vid-ū-ī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Vidua + -inæ.] A subfamily of Ploceidæ, named from the genus Vidua; the whidahs and related forms: variously restricted. (a) In a broad sense, lately adopted by some monographers, one of two sub-Paradise Whidah-bird (Steganura paradisea), male.

families of Ploceidæ, containing all those with very short or spurious first primary of slender falcate form, of whatever other character: opposed to Ploceinæ alone. It thus covers a very large series of about 40 genera of not only African, but also Oriental, etc., birds, including those usually called Spermestinæ, as waxbills, amadavats, blood-finches, senegals, strawberry-finches, sociable weavers, etc. See Philetærus, Pyrenestes, Quelea, Spermestes, Amadina, Tæniopygia, Estrelda, with various cuts. (b) In a narrow sense, confined to those African forms in the males of which the tail is longer than the wings, sometimes extraordinarily lengthened into an arched train or of other special figure; the whidahs proper. Two of these remarkable birds are described under Vidua and Videstrelda respectively. A third is the widow of paradise, Vidua (or Steganura) paradisea. This was first described and figured by Edwards in 1747 as the red-breasted long-tailed finch; by the early French ornithologists as grande veuve d'Angola and veuve à collier d'or; and is the original whidah-bird of Latham, 1783. In the male the four middle tail-feathers are broad and flattened, and two of them taper to mere filaments; the length is 11 inches, of which the tail makes 8½; the wing is 3 inches; the color is chiefly black, varied with white, brown, and buff, and especially marked with a collar of orange-rufous. The female is quite different in color, and 6 inches long, of which the tail is only 2½. This whidah is widely distributed in Africa, and is the one oftenest seen in cages. A fourth is Vidua (Linura) fischeri, of East Africa, 10 inches long, with all four of the middle tail-feathers wired throughout. The foregoing are all the species in which the four middle tail-feathers are peculiar and the rest plain. But in other whidahs all the rectrices share more or less elongation. Such belong to the three genera Chera, Coliuspasser (or Penthetria), and Penthetriopsis. Chera procne of South Africa is the epaulet-whidah, of which the male is glossy-black above and below, with scarlet shoulders, and 19 inches long, with a tail of 15 inches. This is the only member of its genus. The species of Coliuspasser are several, of which the best-known is C. ardens (with nearly twenty other New Latin names). The male of this is black above and below with a scarlet collar across the fore neck; it inhabits South Africa. C. laticaudus, C. hartlaubi, C. albonotata, and C. eques are the other species of this genus. The three members of the genus Penthetriopsis furnish the remaining type of whidahs, in which the males are black, varied with bright-yellow, as P. macrura of western and equatorial Africa, and P. macrocerca of northeastern Africa.

viduity (vi-dū′i-ti), n. [< L. viduita(t-)s, widowhood, < vidua, a widow: see widow.] Widowhood. Bp. Hall, Honour of Married Clergy, i. § 6.

viduous (vid′ū-us), a. [< L. viduus, widowed, bereft: see widow.] Widowed. [Rare.]

King Horn (E. E. T. S.), p. 99.

vielle (vi-el′), n. [F.: akin to viol: see viol.] 1. One of the large early forms of the medieval viol.

Afterwards the latter name [viole] was exclusively used, and ultimately passed into the modern form Violin, while the name Vielle was given to a totally different instrument, the Organistrum or Symphonia, whence the French Chifonié. This is the modern Viol, in which the music is produced by the rotation of a wheel.
W. K. Sullivan, Introd. to O'Curry's Anc. Irish, p. dxxiv.

2. Same as hurdy-gurdy, 1.

Vienna basin. In geol., the name given to an orographically not very well defined area, having Vienna near its southwestern extremity and extending to the Bohemian mountains on the northwest and the Carpathians on the northeast, and underlain by a series of Tertiary rocks remarkable for their extent, size, and complicated development. This Tertiary belongs chiefly to the Neogene of the Austrian geologists (see Neogene), and is divided into several subgroups, beginning with the Aquitanian, followed (in ascending order) by the Sarmatian and Mediterranean subdivisions—these all being of Miocene age—and then by the Congerian or Pliocene. The Vienna basin opened out to the east into a broad Miocene inland sea, slightly brackish, and is believed to have been connected, in former times, with the Aralo-Caspian basin, and perhaps even with the Arctic Ocean. It also communicated with the basin of the upper Danube, and with an area lying north of the Carpathians—in both cases, however, by narrow channels. Some writers limit the name Vienna basin to a smaller area lying pretty closely adjacent to the northern flanks of the eastern Alps, and partly included within their spurs.

Vienna caustic. A mixture of caustic potash and quicklime. See caustic.

Vienna draught. Compound infusion of senna; black-draught.

Vienna lake. A somewhat indefinite product, but usually a dark-red lake with little strength obtained from the liquors remaining from the making of carmine. Also called Florence lake and Paris lake.

B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 42.

5. A scene as represented by painting, drawing, or photography; a picture or sketch, especially a landscape.—6. Manner or mode of looking at things; manner of regarding subjects on which various opinions may be held; judgment; opinion; conception; notion; way of thinking; theory.

There is a great difference of view as to the way in which perfection shall be sought.
Marg. Fuller, Woman in the 19th Cent., p. 19.

One Hester Prynne, who appeared to have been rather a noteworthy personage in the view of our ancestors.
Hawthorne, Scarlet Letter, Int., p. 36.

They have all my views, and I believe they will carry them out unless overruled by a higher Power.
Kane, Sec. Grinn. Exp., I. 258.

Persons who take what is called a high view of life and of human nature are never weary of telling us that money-getting is not man's noblest occupation.
Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLII. 193.

7. Something looked toward or forming the subject of consideration; intention; design; purpose; aim.

The allegory has another view.
Bacon, Physical Fables, ii., Expl.

I write without any view to profit or praise.
Swift, Gulliver's Travels, iv. 12.

8†. Appearance; show; aspect.

So, at his bloody view, her eyes are fled
Into the deep dark cabins of her head.
Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 1037.

New graces find,
Which, by the splendour of her view
Dazzled before, we ever knew.
Waller, The Night-Piece.

9. In law, an inspection by the jury of property or a place the appearance or condition of which is involved in the case, or useful to enable the jury to understand the testimony, as of a place where a crime has been committed.—10. Specifically, inspection of a dead body; an autopsy.—11†. The footing of a beast. Halliwell.—Bird's-eye view. See bird's-eye.—Dissolving views, a name given to pictures thrown on a screen by a lantern in such manner that they appear to dissolve every one into that following, without any interval of blank between them. To cause the pictures to "dissolve," two lanterns are required, each of which projects its picture upon the same field on the screen, both being in the same focus. One picture being projected, to cause it to disappear gradually and the next to take its place, a sliding cap or hood is mechanically withdrawn from the front of the second lantern and placed before the first lantern. Another method is to turn on the gas of one lantern while shutting off the gas of the other. The result is the same by either method, the first picture disappearing as the second appears, the two melting one into the other till one is lost and the other becomes clear. By a recent improved method only one lantern is used, and by appropriate mechanism a picture is substituted for that preceding it so quickly that there is no appreciation of any interval between them.—Field of view. See field.—In view of, in consideration of; having regard to.—On view, open or submitted to public inspection; exhibited to the public: as, pictures placed on view.—Point of view. See point[1].—Side view. See side[1] and side-view.—To the view, so as to be seen by everybody; in public.

Mechanic slaves
With greasy aprons, rules, and hammers, shall Uplift us to the view. Shak., A. and C., v. 2. 211.

View of frank-pledge, in Eng. law: (a) A court of record, now fallen into almost total desuetude, held once in the year within a particular hundred, township, or manor, by the steward of the leet. Wharton. (b) In Anglo-Saxon law, the office of a sheriff in seeing all the frank-pledges of a hundred, and that all youths above fourteen belonged to some tithing: a function of the court-leet. Stimson.

=Syn. 4 and 5. View, Prospect, Scene, Landscape. View is the most general of these words; prospect most suggests the idea that the beholder is at a place somewhat elevated, so as to be able to see far; scene most suggests the idea of resemblance to a picture; landscape most suggests the idea of diversity in unity.

view (vū), v. [Early mod. E. also vewe; < view, n.] I. trans. 1. To see; look on; behold.

When most I wink, then do mine eyes best see,
For all the day I view things unrespected.

Milton, P. R., i. 182.

At Mary's Tomb (sad, sacred Place!)
The Virtues shall their Vigils keep.
Prior, Ode Presented to the King, st. 1.

3. Eccles.: (a) Originally, in the early church, the watch kept in a church or cemetery on the night before a feast, the time being occupied in prayer. The assembly on such occasions often leading to disorders, the custom of holding such vigils came to be abandoned in the eleventh or twelfth century. A trace of the old custom remains in the matins, lauds, and midnight mass before Christmas day. Hence — (b) The day and night preceding a festival; the eve or day before a festival; strictly, an eve which is a fast. Special offices or the use of the collect of the festival mark the vigil. If the day before such a festival is Sunday, the fast is transferred to the previous Saturday. Vigils are observed in the Roman Catholic, the Greek, the Anglican, and other churches.

He that shall live this day, and see old age,
Will yearly on the vigil feast his neighbours,
And say, "To-morrow is St. Crispian."
Shak., Hen. V., iv. 3. 45.

Vigna (vig'nä), n. [NL. (Savi, 1824), named after Dominico Vigna, professor of botany at Pisa in 1628.] A genus of leguminous plants, of the tribe Phaseoleæ and subtribe Phaseolinæ. It is distinguished from the type genus (Phaseolus) by the absence of a beak upon the keel-petals, or by the failure of the beak, if developed, to form a perfect spiral. There are about 30 species, natives of warm regions of both hemispheres. They are usually twining or prostrate herbs, with pinnate leaves of three leaflets, and yellowish or rarely purplish flowers in a short cluster upon an axillary peduncle, followed by cylindrical pods which become greatly elongated — sometimes, it is said, a yard long. For V. Sinensis, universally cultivated in the tropics, and now also in southern parts of Europe and the United States, see chowlee, and cow-pea (under pea[1]); its stems are trailing or climbing and often branched. V. lanceolata of Australia, also edible, produces, besides the ordinary cylindrical pods, others from buried flowers fruiting under ground, and resembling the peanut. V. luteola is known as seaside bean, and V. Sinensis as red bean, in the West Indies. One species occurs in the United States, V. luteola, a yellow-flowered hirsute twiner of brackish marshes from Georgia to Florida and Texas.

vignette (vin-yet' or vin'yet), n. [Formerly also vignett; < F. vignette, dim. of vigne, vineyard, vine, < L. vinea, a vine: see vine.] 1. A running ornament of vine-leaves, tendrils, and grapes, as in architecture.— 2. The flourishes in the form of vine-leaves, branches, etc., with which capital letters in manuscripts are sometimes surrounded.— 3. In printing, the engraved illustration or decoration that precedes a title-page or the beginning of a chapter: so called because many of the cuts first made for books in France were inclosed with a border of the general character of trailing vines.— 4. Hence, any image or picture; a cut or illustration.

Her imagination was full of pictures, . . . divine vignettes of mild spring or mellow autumn moments.
Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, x.

Assisi, in the January twilight, looked like a vignette out of some brown old missal.
H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 213.

Of tower or duomo, sunny-sweet,
Or palace, how the city glittered!
Tennyson, The Daisy.

5. A photographic portrait showing only the head, or the head and shoulders, and so printed that the ground shades off insensibly around the subject into an even color, which may be that of the untreated paper, or a more or less dark shade produced by a separate operation; hence, any picture, not a portrait, treated in the same way.

vignette (vin-yet'), v. t.; pret. and pp. vignetted, ppr. vignetting. [< vignette, n.] In photog., to treat or produce, as a portrait, in the style of a vignette.

vignetter (vin-yet'ėr), n. In photog., any device for causing the edges of a printed part of a negative to fade away evenly and gradually into the background. A form of vignetter may be interposed between the camera and the subject, so that the portrait will be vignetted directly on the negative. See vignetting-glass and vignetting-paper.

vignetting-glass (vin-yet'ing-glàs), n. In photog., a glass frame for the same use and made on the same principles as the vignetting-paper. A usual form has an aperture of clear glass in the middle, around which are carried thin layers of tissue-paper, every layer projecting a little beyond that placed upon it. Another form is of deep-orange glass, with a center of white glass, the gradation being effected by grinding away the edge of the encircling orange part. Also called vignetter.

vignetting-mask (vin-yet'ing-màsk), n. Same as vignetting-paper.

vignetting-paper (vin-yet'ing-pā″pėr), n. In photog., a mask used in printing vignette pictures. It is a sheet of thin paper with a piece of the desired size left clear and semi-transparent in the middle, proceeding from which shading is carried in an opaque color so as gradually to attain complete opacity, and thus cause the strongly printed part of the negative in the middle to fade by even gradation around its edge to the color of the unprinted paper. Also called vignetter and vignetting-mask.

vignettist (vin-yet'ist), n. [< vignette + -ist.] A maker of vignettes; an artist who devotes his attention to vignettes. N. and Q., 7th ser., III. 260.

vignite (vig'nīt), n. A magnetic iron ore.

vignoble† (vē-nyō'bl), n. [F., a vineyard, < vigne, vine: see vine.] A vineyard.

That excellent vignoble of Pontaq and Obrien, from whence comes the choicest of our Bordeaux wines.
Evelyn, Diary, July 13, 1683.

vigonia (vi-gō'ni-ä), n. Same as vicugna.

A herd of thirty-six, including the kinds called llamas, alpacas, and vicunas or vigonias, were sent from Lima.
Ure, Dict., III. 136.

Vigo plaster. See plaster.

Active strength or force of body; physical force; a flourishing physical condition; also, strength of mind; mental health and power; by extension, force of healthy growth in plants.

The sinewy vigour of the traveller.

He who runs or dances begs
The equal Vigour of two Legs. Prior, Alma, ii.

And strangely spoke
The faith, the vigour, bold to dwell
On doubts that drive the coward back.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, xcv.

2. Strength or force in general; powerful or energetic action; energy; efficacy; potency.

> And with a sudden vigour it doth posset
> And curd . . .
> The thin and wholesome blood.
> Shak., Hamlet, i. 5. 68.

> The vigour of the Parliament had begun to humble the pride of the bishops. Milton, Second Defence.

I. n. 1. A small assemblage of houses, less than a town or city, and larger than a hamlet. In many of the United States the incorporated village exists as the least populous kind of corporate municipality. Its boundaries are usually not identical with those of any primary division of the county, but include only the space occupied by houses adjoining or nearly adjoining.

The same daye we passyd Pauya, and lay yt nyght at Seint Jacobo, a vyllage.
Sir R. Guylforde, Pylgrymage, p. 5.

A walled town is more worthier than a village.

The maidens of the villagery. Shak., M. N. D., ii. 1. 35.

villain (vil'ān), n. and a. [Also archaically, in legal and historical use, villein; formerly sometimes villan, early mod. E. vilayn, etc.; < ME. vilain, vilein, vileyn, also sometimes vilains, vilans, vileyns, < OF. vilein, vilain, villain, villein, nom. also vilains, vilainz, F. vilain, a farm-servant, serf, peasant, clown, scoundrel, also adj. base, mean, wicked, = Pr. vilan, vila = Sp. villano = Pg. villão = It. villano, < ML. villanus, a farm-servant, serf, clown, < L. villa, a farm: see vill. The forms villain, villein, etc., are historically one, and the attempt to differentiate them in meaning is idle.]

I. n. 1. A member of the lowest class of unfree persons during the prevalence of the feudal system; a feudal serf. In respect to their lords or owners the villains had no rights, except that the lord might not kill or maim them, or ravish the females; they could acquire or hold no property against their lord's will; they were obliged to perform all the menial services he demanded; and the cottages and plots of land they occupied were held merely at his will. In respect, however, of other persons besides their lord they had the rights and privileges of freemen. Villains were either regardant (which see) or in gross. They were in view of the law annexed to the soil (adscripti or adscriptitii glebæ), belonging to a manor as fixtures, passing with it when it was conveyed or inherited, and they could not be sold or transferred as persons separate from the land. The latter belonged personally to their lord, who could sell or transfer them at will.

Villain? by my blood,
I am as free-born as your Venice duke!
Middleton, Blurt, Master-Constable, ii. 1.

The villeins owe to the lord all sorts of dues and services, personal labour, among others, on the lands which form his domain; they may not leave the Manor without his permission; no one of them can succeed to the land of another without his assent; and the legal theory even is that the movable property of the villein belongs to the lord. Yet it may confidently be laid down that, in the light of modern research, none of these disadvantages prove an absolutely servile status, and that all may be explained without reference to it.
Maine, Early Law and Custom, p. 305.

The villain was not a slave, but a freeman minus the very important rights of his lord.
E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, V. 320.

Hence—2. An ignoble or base-born person generally; a boor, peasant, or clown.

Pour the blood of the villain in one basin, and the blood of the gentleman in another, what difference shall here be proved? Bacon.

May. Where is your mistress, villain? when went she abroad?
Pren. Abroad, sir! why, as soon as she was up, sir.
Dekker and Webster, Northward Ho, i. 3.

3. A man of ignoble or base character; especially, one who is guilty or capable of gross wickedness; a scoundrel; a knave; a rascal; a rogue: often used humorously in affectionate or jocose reproach.

One may smile, and smile, and be a villain.
Shak., Hamlet, i. 5. 108.

This ring is mine; he was a villain
That stole it from my hand; he was a villain
That put it into yours.
Dekker and Webster, Northward Ho, i. 3.

II. a. 1. Of or pertaining to, or consisting of, villains or serfs.

The villein class, notwithstanding legal and canonical hindrances, aspired to holy orders as one of the avenues to liberty. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 405.

2. Characteristic of or befitting a villain or slave; servile; base; villainous.

For thou art the moste vileyn knyght that euer I mette in my lif. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 690.

Ille happe haue he, that vylenis [read vyleins?] knyght, that asketh eny tribute of eny trauellynge knyghtes.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 95.

villainous (vil'ān-us), a. [Also villanous, and archaically villenous; < villain + -ous.] 1. Pertaining to, befitting, or having the character of a villain, in any sense; especially, very wicked or depraved; extremely vile.

One that hath spoke most villanous speeches of the duke.
Shak., M. for M., v. i. 265.

2. Proceeding from extreme wickedness or depravity: as, a villainous action.—3. Of things, very bad; dreadful; mean; vile; wretched.

This villanous salt-petre should be digg'd
Out of the bowels of the harmless earth.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., i. 3. 60.

A many of these fears
Would put me into some villainous disease,
Should they come thick upon me.
B. Jonson, Volpone, v. 1.

Villanous, spiteful luck! I'll hold my life some of these saucy drawers betrayed him.
Dekker and Webster, Northward Ho, i. 2.

Villainous judgment, in old Eng. law, a judgment which deprived one of his lex libera, which discredited and disabled him as a juror or witness, forfeited his goods and chattels and lands for life, wasted the lands, razed the houses, rooted up the trees, and committed his body to prison. Wharton. =Syn. Execrable, Abominable, etc. See nefarious.

villainous† (vil'ān-us), adv. [< villainous, a.] In a vile manner or way; villainously.

With foreheads villainous low.
Shak., Tempest, iv. 1. 250.

villainously (vil'ān-us-li), adv. In a villainous manner, in any sense. Also villanously.

The streets are so villainously narrow that there is not room in all Paris to turn a wheelbarrow.
Sterne, Tristram Shandy, vii. 17.

villainousness (vil'ān-us-nes), n. The state or character of being villainous; baseness; extreme depravity; vileness.

villainy (vil'ān-i), n.; pl. villainies (-iz). [Also villany; < ME. villainie, villanie, villeinie, villainee, vileinie, vileynye, vilanye, vilonye, vylany, vylney, velany,* < OF. vilainie, vilanie, vilenie, vilonie, of a farm-servant, = Sp. villanía = Pg. It. villania, < ML. villania, the condition of a farm-servant, villainy, < villanus, a farm-servant, villain: see villain. The proper etymological spelling is villany, the form villainy, with the corresponding forms in ME. and OF. (with diphthong ai or ei), being erroneously conformed to the noun villain, in which the diphthong has a historical basis.] 1†. The condition of a villain or serf; rusticity.

The entertainment we have had of him
Is far from villany or servitude.
Marlowe, Tamburlaine, I., iii. 2.

2. The character of being villainous; the qualities characteristic of a villain; extreme depravity; atrocious wickedness.

Corsed worth cowarddyse & couetyse bothe!
In yow is vylany & vyse, that vertue disstryez.
Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), l. 2375.

Fear not the frowne of grim authority,
Or stab of truth-abhorring villanie.
Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 2.

3†. Discourteous or abusive language; opprobrious terms.

He nevere yet no vileinye ne sayde
In al his lyf unto no maner wight.
Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 70.

Therfore he wolde not that thei sholde speke eny euell of hym ne vilonye. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 643.

4. A villainous act; a crime.

For, God it woot, men may wel often fynde
A lordes sone do shame and vileynye.
Chaucer, Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 295.

If I wer ther without I had the mor sadder or wurchepfull persones abought me, and ther comyn a meny of knavys, and prevaylled in ther entent, it shuld be to me but a vylney. Paston Letters, II. 308.

Cæsar's splendid villany achieved its most signal triumph. Macaulay, Machiavelli.

A private stage
For training infant villanies. Browning, Strafford.

5†. Disgraceful conduct; conduct unbecoming a gentleman.

If we hennes hye
Thus sodeynly, I holde it vilenye.
Chaucer, Troilus, v. 490.

Agravain, brother, where be ye, now lete se what ye do, ffor I peyne me for these ladyes sake for curtesie, and ye peyne yow for theire vilonyes.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 530.

=Syn. 2. Baseness, turpitude, atrocity, infamy. See nefarious.

villakin (vil'ạ-kin), n. [< villa + -kin.] 1. A little villa.

I am every day building villakins, and have given over that of castles. Gay, To Swift, March 31, 1730. (Latham.)

2. A little village.

villan†, n. An obsolete spelling of villain.

villanage, n. See villeinage.

villancico (vē-lyan-thē'kō), n. [Sp., a rustic song, < villano, of the country, rustic: see villain.] A kind of song, akin to the madrigal, popular in Spain in the fifteenth century, consisting of seven-lined stanzas. The melodies to which such songs were sung were often taken as the themes of contrapuntal music, and hence certain motets are still called villancicos.

villanella (vil-ạ-nel'ạ), n. [It. villanella, < villano, rustic: see villain.] An Italian rustic part-song without accompaniment, the precursor of the more refined and artistic canzonetta and madrigal. It was not supposed to be amenable to the strict rules of composition. Also villotte.

villanelle (vil-ạ-nel'), n. [F., < It. villanella: see villanella.] A poem in a fixed form borrowed from the French, and allied to the virelay. It consists of nineteen lines on two rimes, arranged in six stanzas, the first five of three lines, the last of four. The first and third line of the first stanza are repeated alternately as last lines from the second to the fifth stanza, and they conclude the sixth stanza. Great skill is required to introduce them naturally. The typical example of the villanelle is one by Jean Passerat (1534–1602), beginning "J'ai perdu ma tourtourelle."

Who ever heard true Grief relate
Its heartfelt Woes in "six" and "eight"?
Or felt his manly Bosom swell Within a French-made Villanelle? A. Dobson.

villanette (vil-ạ-net'), n. [< villa + -n- + -ette.] A small villa or residence.

villanize†, v. t. See villainize.

villanizer†, n. See villainizer.

villanous, villanously, etc. See villainous, etc.

Villarsia (vi-lär'si-ạ), n. [NL. (Ventenat, 1803), named after the French botanist Dominique Villars (1745–1814).] An untenable name for Villarsiella, a genus of plants of the family Menyanthaceæ. It differs from Menyanthes (the type) in its usually four-valved capsule, and its entire or irregularly sinuate leaves. There are about 10 species, natives of South Africa and Australia. They are herbs with long-stalked radical leaves, numerous yellow or white flowers in cymes which are loosely panicled, or crowded into corymbs, or condensed into an involucrate head. Several species, as Villarsiella calthifolia (Villarsia calthifolia of Mueller) and V. reniformis (Villarsia reniformis of Robert Brown), are called marsh-buttercups.

villatic (vi-lat'ik), a. [< L. villaticus, of or pertaining to a villa or farm, < villa, a country house, a farm: see vill, village.] Of or pertaining to a farm.

> Assailant on the perched roosts
> And nests in order ranged > Of tame villatick fowl. Milton, S. A., l. 1695.

villeggiatura (vi-lej-ạ-tö'rạ), n. [It., < villeggiare, stay at a country-seat, < villa, a country-seat: see villa.] The period spent at a country-seat; retirement in the country.

> Beginning with the warm days of early May, and continuing till the villeggiatura interrupts it late in September, all Venice goes by a single impulse of dolce far niente. Howells, Venetian Life, iv.
>
> Being just now in villeggiatura, I hear many wise remarks from my bucolic friends about the weather. Mortimer Collins, Thoughts in my Garden, I. 5.

villein, n. and a. See villain.

villeinage, villenage (vil'en-ạj), n. [Also villanage; < OF. villenage, vilenage, vilonage (= Sp. villanaje, ML. villenagium), servile tenure, < villein, vilain, etc., a farm-servant, villain: see villain. Cf. villainage.] A tenure of lands and tenements by base—that is, menial—services. It was originally founded on the servile state of the occupiers of the soil, who were allowed to hold portions of land at the will of their lord, on condition of performing base or menial services. Where the service was base in its nature, and undefined as to time and amount, the tenant being bound to do whatever was commanded, the tenure received the name of pure villeinage; but where the service, although of a base nature, was certain and defined, it was called privileged villeinage, and sometimes villein socage. The tenants in villeinage were divided into two distinct classes. First, there were the villani proper, whose holdings, the hides, half-hides, virgates, and bovates (see hide[3], holding), were correlative with the number of oxen allotted to them or contributed by them to the manorial plow-team of eight oxen. Below the villani proper were the numerous smaller tenants of what may be termed the cottier class, sometimes called in "Liber Niger" bordarii (probably from the Saxon bord, a cottage), and these cottagers, possessing generally no oxen, and therefore taking no part in the common plowing, still in some manors seem to have ranked as a lower grade of villani, having small allotments in the open fields, in some manors five-acre strips apiece, in other manors more or less. Lastly, below the villains and cottiers were, in some districts, remains, hardly to be noticed in the later cartularies, of a class of servi, or slaves, fast becoming merged in the cottier class above them, or losing themselves among the household servants or laborers upon the lord's demesne. (Seebohm.) (See manor, yard-land, heriot.) It frequently happened that lands held in villeinage descended in uninterrupted succession from father to son, until at length the occupiers or villains became entitled, by prescription or custom, to hold their lands against the lord so long as they performed the required services. And although the villains themselves acquired freedom, or their land came into the possession of freemen, the villein services were still the condition of the tenure, according to the custom of the manor. These customs were preserved and evidenced by the rolls of the several courts-baron in which they were entered, or kept on foot by the constant immemorial usage of the several manors in which the lands lay. And as such tenants had nothing to show for their estates but the entries in those rolls, or copies of them authenticated by the steward, they at last came to be called tenants by copy of court-roll, and their tenure a copyhold.

> The burden of villeinage in England had not been heavy even under the Norman rule, when the ceorl had under the shadow of his master's contempt retained many of the material benefits of his earlier freedom. But the English ceorl had had slaves of his own, and the Norman lawyer steadily depressed the ceorl himself to the same level. The ceorl had his right in the common land of his township; his Latin name villanus had been a symbol of freedom; but his privileges were bound to the land, and when the Norman lord took the land he took the villein with it. Still the villein retained his customary rights, his house and land and rights of wood and hay; his lord's demesne depended for cultivation on his services, and he had in his lord's sense of self-interest the sort of protection that was shared by the horse and the ox. Law and custom, too, protected him in practice more than in theory. So villeinage grew to be a base tenure, differing in degree rather than in kind from socage, and privileged as well as burdened. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 264.

Pure villeinage, in feudal law, a tenure of lands by uncertain services at the will of the lord, so that the tenant is bound to do whatever is commanded of him: opposed to privileged villeinage.

villenous†, a. See villainous.

villi, n. Plural of villus.

villiform (vil'i-fôrm), a. [< L. villus, shaggy hair, + forma, form.] Villous in form; like villi in appearance or to the touch; resembling the plush or pile of velvet; having the character of a set of villi.

villiplacental (vil[ɨ]i-plā-sen'tạl), a. [< NL. villus + placenta: see placental.] Having a tufted or villous placenta of the kind peculiar to indeciduate mammals, as the hoofed quadrupeds, sirenians, and cetaceans.

Villiplacentalia (vil-i-plas-en-tā'li-ạ), n. pl. [NL.: see villiplacental.] A series of indeciduate mammals having a tufted or villous placenta. It consists of the Ungulata, Sirenia, and Cetacea.

villitis (vi-lī'tis), n. [NL., appar. < villus + -itis.] Inflammation of the coronary cushion or secreting substance of the hoof-wall of the horse, leading to the formation of imperfect horn. Also called coronitis.

villoid (vil'oid), a. [< NL. villus + -oid.] In bot., pertaining to or resembling villi or fine hairs; villiform.

villose (vil'ōs), a. Same as villous. Bailey.

villosity (vi-los'i-ti), n.; pl. villosities (-tiz). [= F. villosité, < L. villosus, shaggy: see villous.] 1. A number of villi together; a roughness or shagginess resulting from villiform processes; a nap or pile, as of an organic membrane; fine or short hispidity; pilosity.

> The villosities may also be peopled with numerous bacilli. Sanitarian, XVI. 529.

2. In bot., the state of being villous, or covered with long, soft hairs; such hairs collectively.

villotte (vi-lot'), n. Same as villanella.

villous (vil'us), a. [= F. villeux = It. villoso, < L. villosus, hairy, shaggy, < villus, shaggy hair: see villus.] 1. Having villi; abounding in villiform processes; covered with fine hairs or woolly substance; nappy; shaggy; finely hirsute or hispid: as, a villous membrane.—2. In bot., pubescent with long and soft hairs which are not interwoven.—Villous cancer, papilloma.

villus (vil'us), n.; pl. villi (-ī). [NL., < L. villus, shaggy hair, a tuft of hair.] 1. In anat.: (a) One of numerous minute vascular projections from the mucous membrane of the intestine, of a conical, cylindric, clubbed, or filiform shape, consisting essentially of a lacteal vessel as a central axis, with an arteriole and a veinlet, inclosed in a layer of epithelium, with the basement membrane and muscular tissue of the mucous membrane, and cellular or reticular tissue. The villi occur chiefly in the small intestine, and especially in the upper part of that tube; there are estimated to be several millions in man; they collectively constitute the beginnings of the absorbent or lacteal vessels of the intestine. See also cut under lymphatic. (b) One of the little vascular tufts or processes of the shaggy chorion of an ovum or embryo, in later stages of development entering into the formation of the fetal part of the placenta. See cut under uterus. (c) Some villiform part or process of various animals. See cut under hydranth.—2. In bot., one of the long, straight, and soft hairs which sometimes cover the fruit, flowers, and other parts of plants.—Arachnoidal villi, the Pacchionian bodies or glands.—Intestinal villi. See def. 1.

Two Villi of the Small Intestine, magnified about fifty diameters.

a, lymphatic tissue of the villus; b, its columnar epithelium, three detached cells of which are seen at b^2; c, the artery, and d, the vein, with their connecting capillary network enveloping and hiding e, the lacteal radicle, which occupies the center of the villus and opens into a network of lacteal vessels at its base.

Vilmorinia (vil-mō-rin'i-ạ), n. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1825), named after P. V. L. de Vilmorin (1746–1804), a noted French gardener.] A proposed genus of leguminous plants, now made a section of the genus Poitea. It is characterized by odd-pinnate leaves, an elongated tubular calyx, oblong petals, the wings shorter than the keel, and by a wingless acuminate stalked pod. The only species of the section, Poitea multiflora, is an erect shrub, native in Hayti, with downy leaves of five or six pairs of leaflets. It bears axillary racemes of purple flowers, and is cultivated under glass under the name of Vilmorin's pea-flower.

vim (vim), n. [< L. vim, acc. of vis, strength, force, power, energy, in particular hostile force, violence, = Gr. ἰς (*Fις), strength. The acc. form seems to have been taken up in school or college, from the frequent L. phrases per vim, by force, vim facere, use force, etc.] Vigor; energy; activity. [Colloq.]

> The men I find at the head of the great enterprises of this Coast [California] have great business power—a wide practical reach, a boldness, a sagacity, a vim, that I do not believe can be matched anywhere in the world. S. Bowles, in Merriam, II. 7.

vimen (vī'men), n. [NL., < L. vimen (-in-), a pliant twig, a withe, < viere, twist together, plait: see vine, withe[2].] In bot., a long and flexible shoot of a plant.

viminal (vim'i-nạl), a. [< L. viminalis, of or pertaining to twigs or osiers, < vimen (-in-), a twig: see vimen.] Of or pertaining to twigs or shoots; consisting of twigs; producing twigs. Blount.

Viminaria (vim-i-nā'ri-ạ), n. [NL. (Smith, 1804), so called from its rush-like twiggy branches and petioles; < L. vimen, a twig: see vimen.] A genus of leguminous plants, of the tribe Podalyrieæ. It is characterized by a slightly five-toothed calyx, ample banner-petal, connate keel-petals, an ovoid indehiscent pod, and commonly a solitary seed with a small strophiole. It is peculiar in the absence of leaves, which are represented only by filiform elongated petioles (rarely bearing from one to three small leaflets), and adding to the broom-like effect of the elongated slender branches. The only species, V. denudata, is a native of Australia, there known as swamp-oak and as swamp- or rush-broom; its flowers are small, orange-yellow, borne in terminal racemes.

vimineous (vi-min'ē-us), a. [< L. vimineus, made of twigs or osiers, < vimen (-in-), a twig, a withe: see vimen.] 1. Made of twigs or shoots. [Rare.]

> In a Hive's vimineous Dome
> Ten thousand Bees enjoy their Home.
> Prior, Alma, iii.

2. In bot., made up of or bearing long, flexible twigs; viminal.

vina (vē'nạ), n. [Also veena; Skt. vīnā.] A Hindu musical instrument of the guitar family, having seven strings stretched over a long finger-board of bamboo which rests on two gourds and has about twenty frets, the position of which may be varied at the pleasure of the performer. In playing the instrument, one gourd is placed on the shoulder and one on the hip. Also bina.

vinaceous (vī-nā'shius), a. [< L. vinaceus, pertaining to wine or to the grape, < vinum, wine: see wine.] 1. Belonging to wine or grapes.—2. Wine-colored; claret-colored; red, like wine.

vinage (vī'nāj), n. [< vine + -age.] The addition of spirit to wine to preserve it or enable it to withstand transportation.

Vinago (vī-nā'gō), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1800), earlier in Willughby and Ray, equiv. to œnas, so called with ref. to the vinaceous color of the neck; < L. vinum, wine, grapes: see wine.] 1. An extensive genus of Old World fruit-pigeons, variously applied in some restricted senses: exactly synonymous with Treron (which see).—2. [l. c.] Any pigeon of this genus; formerly, some other pigeon.

vinaigrette (vin-ā-gret'), n. [< F. vinaigrette, < vinaigre, vinegar: see vinegar. Cf. vinegarette.] 1. A small bottle or box used for carrying about the person some drug having a strong and pungent odor, commonly aromatic vinegar. It is usually fitted with a double cover, the inner one made of openwork or pierced, the drug being either in solid form or held by a fragment of sponge.

Vinaigrette of French workmanship.

2. A vinegar sauce. [Rare.]—3. A small two-wheeled vehicle to be drawn like a Bath chair by a boy or a man. Simmonds. [Rare.]

vinaigrier (vi-nā'gri-ėr), n. [= F. vinaigrier, < vinaigre, vinegar: see vinegar.] The whip-scorpion, Thelyphonus giganteus: same as grampus, 6. See vinegerone.

vinaigrous (vi-nā'grus), a. [< F. vinaigre, vinegar, + -ous.] Sour like vinegar; hence, crabbed, peevish, or ill-tempered.

> The fair Palace Dames publicly declare that this Lafayette, detestable though he be, is their saviour for once. Even the ancient vinaigrous Tantes admit it. Carlyle, French Rev., I. vii. 9.

Vinalia (vī-nā'li-ạ), n. pl. [L., pl. of vinalis, of or pertaining to wine, < vinum, wine: see vine.] In Rom. antiq., a double festival, celebrated on April 22d and on August 19th, at which an offering of wine from the vintage of the preceding autumn was made to Jupiter.

vinarian (vī-nā'ri-ạn), a. [< L. vinarius, of or pertaining to wine, < vinum, wine: see wine.] Having to do with wine.—Vinarian cup, a large and ornamental drinking-cup, especially of Italian origin.

vinarious (vī-nā'ri-us), a. Same as vinarian.

vinasse (vi-nas'), n. [< F. vinasse = Pr. vinaci = Sp. vinácea = It. vinaccia, dregs of pressed grapes, < L. vinacea, a grape-skin, < vinum, wine: see wine.] The residue of the distillation of wines or of the fermented molasses from beet-roots.

The spirit is then distilled off, leaving a liquor, usually called vinasse, which contains all the original potash salts. Spons' Encyc. Manuf., I. 258.

The corresponding potassium compounds are almost exclusively made in Germany, from Stassfurt salts, and in France, from the "vinasse" of beet-root manufactures. Encyc. Brit., XXV. 46.

Calcined vinasse, the result of evaporating to dryness and calcining the vinasse remaining from the distillation of fermented beet-root. From it are obtained various potash salts. It is technically called salin.

vinatico (vi-nat'i-kō), n. [< Pg. vinhatico, wine-colored, < vinho, wine: see wine.] A lauraceous tree, Phœbe Indica, or its wood. It is a noble tree, native in Madeira, the Canaries, and the Azores. The wood is hard and beautiful, like a coarse mahogany, sought for fine furniture and turning.

Vinca (ving'kạ), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1735), earlier as Pervinca (Tournefort, 1700), and Vincapervinca (Brunfels, 1530), < L. vinca, vincapervinca, and vinca pervinca, periwinkle: see periwinkle.] A genus of dicotyledonous sympetalous plants, of the family Apocynaceæ, and tribe Plumerieæ. It is characterized by solitary axillary flowers, a stigma densely and plumosely tufted with hairs, a disk consisting of two scales, biseriate ovules, and a fruit of terete follicles. There are about 12 species, of two sections: Lochnera, containing 3 tropical species with numerous ovules and normal lanceolate anthers; and Pervinca, species chiefly of the Mediterranean region, with usually six to eight ovules in each carpel, and with peculiar short anther-cells borne on the margin of a broad connective. They are erect or procumbent herbs or undershrubs, with opposite leaves, and usually attractive flowers of moderate size. The species are known as periwinkle (see periwinkle, and cuts under peduncle and opposite). V. major is locally known in England as band-plant and cut-finger, and V. rosea in Jamaica as old-maid.

Vincentian (vin-sen'shian), a. [< Vincent (St. Vincent de Paul) + -i-an.] Of or pertaining to Saint Vincent de Paul (1576–1660): specifically applied to certain religious associations of which he was the founder or patron.—Vincentian Congregation, an association of secular priests, devoted to hearing confession, relieving the poor, and directing the education of the clergy.

vincetoxicum (vin-sē-tok'si-kum), n. [NL., < L. vincere, conquer, + toxicum, poison: see toxic.] The officinal name of the swallowwort or tamepoison, Cynanchum (Asclepias) Vincetoxicum, the root of which was formerly esteemed as a counter-poison. Both root and leaves have emetic properties.

vincibility (vin-si-bil'i-ti), n. [< vincible + -ity (see -bility).] The state or character of being vincible; capability of being conquered.

The vincibility of such a love. Richardson, Sir Charles Grandison, VI. 49. (Davies.) vincible (vin'si-bl), a. [< L. vincibilis, that can be easily gained or overcome, < vincere, conquer: see victor.] Capable of being vanquished, conquered, or subdued; conquerable.

The man cannot . . . be concluded a heretic unless his opinion be an open recession from plain demonstrative Divine authority (which must needs be notorious, voluntary, vincible, and criminal). Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 373.

Nor is any prejudice deeper, or less vincible, than that of profane minds against religion. J. Howe, The Living Temple, Works, i. 1.

vincibleness (vin'si-bl-nes), n. Vincibility.

vincture† (vingk'tūr), n. [< L. vinctura, a bandage, a ligature, < vincere, bind.] A binding. Blount, 1670.

vincula, n. Plural of vinculum.

Vincul© aria (vin-kū-lā'ri-ạ), n. [NL. (Defrance), < L. vinculum, a band: see vinculum.] The typical genus of Vinculariidæ, whose members are found fossil from the Cretaceous onward and living at the present time.

Vinculariidæ (vin'kū-lā-rī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Vincularia + -idæ.] A family of chilostomatous gymnolæmatous bryozoans, whose typical genus is Vincularia, having no epistome or circular lophophore, and a movable lip of the mouth of the cells. Also called Microporidæ.

vinculate (ving'kū-lāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. vinculated, ppr. vinculating. [< L. vinculatus, pp. of vinculare (> It. vincolare = Sp. Pg. vincular), bind, < vinculum, a band: see vinculum.] To tie; bind. [Rare.]

Rev. John Angell James of Birmingham — the man whom Dr. Cox described as "angel vinculated between two apostles." The Congregationalist, July 7, 1887.

★vinculum (ving'kū-lum), n.; pl. vincula (-lạ). [NL., < L. vinculum, contr. vinclum, a band, bond, rope, cord, fetter, tie, < vincere, bind.] 1. A bond of union; a bond; a tie.—2. In alg., a character in the form of a stroke or brace drawn over a quantity when it consists of several terms, in order to connect them together as one quantity and show that they are to be multiplied or divided, etc., together: thus, $\overline{a+b} \times c$, indicates that the sum of a and b is to be multiplied by c; whereas the expression without this character would indicate simply that b is to be multiplied by c, and the product added to a.—3. In printing, a brace.—4. In anat., a tendinous or ligamentous band uniting certain parts; a frenum. The reason why we cannot stretch out the middle or ring finger very well without the other fingers is because of vincula which connect the several extensor tendons of the fingers so that they do not work separately.—Divorce a vinculo matrimonii, in law, an entire release from the bond of matrimony, with freedom to marry again.—Vincula accessoria tendinum, small folds of synovial membrane between the flexor tendons and bones of the fingers. They are of two sets—the ligamenta brevia, passing between the tendons near their insertions and the lower part of the phalanx immediately above, and the ligamenta longa, joining the tendons at a higher level.—Vinculum subflavum, a small band of yellow elastic tissue in the ligamentum breve of the deep flexor tendons of the hand, stretching from the tendon to the head of the second phalanx. See vincula accessoria tendinum.

viniculturist (vin-i-kul'tūr-ist), n. [< viniculture + -ist.] One who practises viniculture.

The harvesting of the grape crop is the period of anxiety for the viniculturist. Sci. Amer., N. S., LIX. 327.

vinifacteur (vin'i-fak-tėr), n. [F., < L. vinum, wine, + factor, a maker: see wine and factor.] Any apparatus, or piece of apparatus, for making wine.

viniferous (vī-nif'e-rus), a. [< L. vinifer, wine-bearing, < vinum, wine, + ferre = E. bear[1].] Yielding or producing wine, as a country.

vinification (vin″i-fi-kā'shon), n. [= Sp. vinificación, < L. vinum, wine, + -ficatio(n-), < facere, make, do.] The conversion of a saccharine solution into an alcoholic or vinous one by fermentation. [Rare.]

Why do we add yeast to our wort? This practice is unknown in the art of vinification.
Pasteur, Fermentation (trans.), p. 3.

vinificator (vin'i-fi-kā-tor), n. [< L. vinum, wine, + -ficator, < facere, make, do.] A French apparatus for collecting the alcoholic vapors which escape from liquids during vinous fermentation. It is a conical cap surrounded by a reservoir of cold water. The vapors from the tun are condensed and run back down the sides of the cap into the fermenting-tun. E. H. Knight.

vinipote†, n. [< L. vinum, wine, + potare, drink: see potation.] A wine-bibber. Blount, 1670.

vinny† (vin'i), a. [See vinewed, finewed, fenny[1].] Moldy; musty. Malone.

vinolence†, n. Same as vinolency. Bailey.

vinolency† (vin'ō-len-si), n. [As vinolen(t) + -cy.] Drunkenness; wine-bibbing. Bailey.

vinolent† (vin'ō-lent), a. [< ME. vinolent, < OF. vinolent = Sp. Pg. It. vinolento, < L. vinolentus, drunk, full of wine, < vinum, wine: see wine.] 1. Full of wine.

Al vinolent as botel in the spence.
Chaucer, Summoner's Tale, l. 223.

2. Intoxicated.

In wommen vinolent is no defence.
Chaucer, Prol. to Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 467.

vinometer (vī-nom'e-tėr), n. [< L. vinum, wine, + Gr. μέτρον, measure.] A contrivance for measuring the alcoholic strength of wine.

vin ordinaire (vaṅ ôr-dē-nār'). [F.: vin, wine; ordinaire, ordinary, common: see wine and ordinary.] Common wine; low-priced wine such as is almost universally drunk mixed with water throughout the larger part of France, and to a less extent in other countries of southern Europe. It is usually understood to be a red wine. In France it is very commonly supplied without extra charge at table d'hôte meals.

vino santo (vē'nō sän'tō). [It.: vino, wine; santo, holy: see wine and saint[1].] A sweet wine of northern Italy.

vinose (vī'nōs), a. [< L. vinosus: see vinous.] Same as vinous. Bailey. [Rare.]

vinosity (vī-nos'i-ti), n. [= F. vinosité = Sp. vinosidad = Pg. vinosidade = It. vinosità, < L. vinosita(t-)s, the flavor of wine, < vinosus, full of wine: see vinous.] The state or property of being vinous. Blount, 1670.

vinous (vī'nus), a. [< F. vineux = Sp. Pg. It. vinoso, < L. vinosus, full of wine, having the flavor of wine, < vinum, wine: see wine.] 1. Having the qualities of wine: as, a vinous flavor; pertaining to wine or its manufacture.—2. In zoöl., wine-colored; vinaceous.—3. Caused by wine.

And softly thro' a vinous mist
My college friendships glimmer.
Tennyson, Will Waterproof.

Vinous fermentation, the fermentation by which must becomes wine, as distinguished from acetic fermentation. —Vinous hydromel, liquor, etc. See the nouns.

vint (vint), v. t. [< vintage, assumed to be formed from a verb vint* + -age.] To make or prepare, as wine.

I wouldn't give a straw for the best wine that ever was vinted after it had lain here a couple of years.
Trollope, Barchester Towers, xxi.

vintage (vin'tāj), n. [Altered, by association with vintner, from ME. vindage, vendage, < OF. vendange, vindange, F. vendange, < L. vindemia, a gathering of grapes, vintage: see vindemial.] 1. The gathering of the grapes; the season of grape-gathering; the grape-harvest. Blount.

The vintage time . . . is in September.
Coryat, Crudities, I. 40.

2. The annual product of the grape-harvest, with especial reference to the wine obtained.

The antient mythology seems to us like a vintage ill pressed and trod. Bacon, Moral Fables, vi., Int.

A sound wine, Colonel, and I should think of a genuine vintage. O. W. Holmes, Elsie Venner, vii.

The so-called vintage class, which are the finest wines of a good year kept separate and shipped as the produce of that particular year. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 608.

3. Wine in general. [Rare.]

Whom they with meats and vintage of the best
And milk and minstrel melody entertain'd.
Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

vintage† (vin'tāj), v. t. [< vintage, n.] To crop or gather, as grapes, at the vintage.

I humbly beseech his majesty that these royal boughs of forfeiture may not be vintaged or cropped by private suitors. Bacon.

vintager (vin'tāj-ėr), n. [< vintage + -er[1].] One concerned in the vintage, especially a person gathering the grape-harvest.

Turn ye as a vintager to his basket.
Jer. vi. 9. (tr. of Septuagint version).

At this season of the year the vintagers are joyous and negligent. Landor, Imag. Conv., Tasso and Cornelia.

vintiner (vin'ti-nėr), n. [< OF. vintenier, vingtenier, < vingt, twenty, < L. viginti, twenty: see twenty.] The commander of a twenty. See twenty, n., 3.

vintner (vint'nėr), n. [< ME. vyntner, vintener, vyntenere, vyntyner, corrupted from the earlier vineter, viniter, < OF. vinetier, vinotier, F. vinetier = Sp. vinatero = Pg. vinhateiro, < ML. vinetarius, vinitarius, a wine-dealer, < L. vinetum, a vineyard, < vinum, wine: see wine.] One who deals in wine, spirits, etc., especially at wholesale, or on a large scale.

Men of experience deale
To their best proffit; & it were as good
That he should be a gainer as the brood
Of cut-throat vintners.
Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 66.

The Vintners drink Carouses of Joy that he [the Attorney-General] is gone. Howell, Letters, I. vi. 17.

vintnery (vint'nėr-i), n. [< vintner + -y[3] (cf. vintry).] The trade or occupation of a vintner. Carlyle, French Rev., II. v. 2.

vintry (vin'tri), n.; pl. vintries (-triz). [< ME. viniterie, < OF. vineterie*, < vinetier, vintner: see vintner.] A storehouse for wine. [Apparently a term applied in the quotation to one especial establishment of the sort.]

In this neighbourhood was the great house called the Vintrie, with vast wine-vaults beneath.
Pennant, London, II. 466.

vinum (vī'num), n. [NL., < L. vinum, wine: see wine.] In phar., a solution of a medicinal substance in wine; also, wine.

viny (vī'ni), a. [< vine + -y[1].] 1. Of or pertaining to vines; producing vines; abounding in vines.

Baiæ's viny coast. Thomson, Liberty, i.

The pastures fair
High-hung of viny Neufchâtel.
Lowell, Agassiz, iv. 2.

2†. Vine-like; clasping or clinging like vines.

These unfortunate lovers . . . were then possessed with mutual sleep, yet not forgetting with viny embracements to give any eye a perfect model of affection.
Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, iv.

vinyl (vī'nil), n. [< L. vinum, wine, + -yl.] The compound univalent radical CH_2CH, which appears characteristic of many ethylene derivatives.—Vinyl bromide. Same as ethylene bromide, a potent cardiac poison.

★viol[1] (vī'ol), n. [Formerly also violl, viall, voyall, voyol; = D. viool = G. viol (also viola, < It.) = Sw. Dan. fiol, < OF. viole, violle = Pr. viola, viula = Sp. Pg. It. viola, a viol; prob. = OHG. fidula = AS. fithele*, E. fiddle (see fiddle), < ML. vitula, vidula, a viol, appar. so called from its liveliness (cf. vitula jocosa, 'the merry viol'), being prob. < L. vitulari, celebrate a festival, keep holiday, prob. orig. sacrifice a calf, < vitulus, a calf: see veal. Cf. fiddle, prob. a doublet of viol. Hence violin[1], violoncello, etc.] 1. A musical instrument with strings, essentially not greatly different from the lute and the guitar, except that the strings are sounded by means of a bow drawn across them, not by plucking them with the fingers. The viol is the typical representative of a very large, varied, and widely distributed class of instruments, of which in modern music the violin is the chief member. The type includes the following characteristics: a hollow resonance-box or body, made up of a front or belly (which is pierced with one or two sound-holes of varying shape), a back (both front and back being flat or only slightly arched), and sides of various contour according to the particular variety and the period; within the body an internal system of braces, including a sound-post, to withstand the strain of the strings and to give the tone greater sonority; a more or less elongated neck, often with a special finger-board in front, and surmounted by a head, part of which serves as a peg-box; several strings, mostly of gut, fastened at the bottom either to the body directly or to a tail-piece, stretched thence over a bridge and over the finger-board and neck, and fastened at the top to pegs by which their tension and tune can be adjusted; and a bow for sounding the strings, consisting of a stick or back of wood and a large number of horse-hairs whose friction is augmented by the application of rosin. The differences between different instruments of the family in shape, size, number and tuning of strings, and method of manipulation are very numerous and apparently important; but the essential similarity between all the varieties is greater than is commonly thought. The historic genesis of the typical idea of the viol is disputed. By some its origin is asserted to be found in the gradual development, with the addition of sounding by means of a bow, of the ancient lyre into the monochord and the vielle, with various incidental modifications in shape and adjustment. By some its precursor is thought to be the Oriental rebab, or some similar instrument, transplanted into southern Europe, and modified by contact with the traditions of the lyre and monochord. By others great historic importance is attached to the Celtic crowd of western Europe. The problem is greatly complicated by the confusing use of terms in the middle ages, the same name being given to quite distinct instruments, and the same instrument being known by two or three different names. Apparently, also, somewhat distinct lines of development went on simultaneously in Italy, in Germany, and in western Europe. Probably the medieval viol, which reached its most distinctive development in the fifteenth century, was the joint result of several more or less distinct tendencies. It was characterized by a flat back, from five to seven strings tuned in fourths and thirds, a broad, thin neck, and a close amalgamation of the neck with the body. This viol was made in several sizes. The smallest (treble or descant viol) passed over later into the modern violin; the next larger (tenor), into the viola da braccio and viola d'amore and the modern viola; the next (bass), into the viola da gamba and the modern violoncello; and the largest (double-bass), into the violone and the modern double-bass viol.

What did he doe with her brest bone? . . .
He made him a viall to play thereupon.
The Miller and the King's Daughter (Child's Ballads, II. [358]).

The worst can sing or play his part o' th' Violls,
And act his part too in a comedy.
Brome, Antipodes, i. 5.

2†. A large rope formerly used in purchasing an anchor: same as messenger, 4. It was made to lead through one or more blocks before it was brought to the capstan, thus giving additional power.—Bass viol, either one of the larger of the medieval viols (see def. 1), or the modern violoncello.—Chest or consort of viols. See chest[1].—Division viol. Same as viola da gamba.—Viol d'amore. See viola d'amore, under viola[1].

Above all for its sweetnesse and novelty, the viol d'amore of 5 wyre-strings plaid on with a bow, being but an ordinary violin, play'd on lyre way. Evelyn, Diary, Nov. 20, 1679.

viol[2]†, n. An obsolete form of vial.

viola[1] (vē-ō′lä or vī′ō-lä), n. [< It. viola, a viol: see viol.] 1. Same as viol.—2. Specifically, in modern usage, the large violin, properly the alto violin, though generally called the tenor, in size about one seventh larger than the violin. It is provided with four strings tuned in fifths, thus: A, D, G, and C (next below middle C), the two lower strings being wound with silver wire. The viola was probably the first member of the modern string quartet to be developed. Its tone is not so brilliant or varied as that of the violin, though susceptible of a peculiar pathetic quality under the hand of a good player, while in concerted music it is highly effective. Music for the viola is usually written in the alto clef. Also called alto, tenor, bratsche, quint, and taille.—Viola bastarda, a bass viol, or viola da gamba, mounted with sympathetic strings like a viola d'amore; a barytone. See barytone, n., 1 (b).

The original viola da gamba when so strung came to be called the viola bastarda. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 244.

Viola da braccio, a tenor or "arm" viol: so called to distinguish it from the bass viol, or viola da gamba. It had properly six strings, tuned thus: G, D, A, F, C, and G (the second below middle C), but the lowest string was omitted in the eighteenth century. It has been superseded by the modern viola. Also viola da spalla.—Viola da gamba. (a) A bass or "leg" viol: so called to distinguish it from the viola da braccio. It had properly six strings, tuned thus: D, A, E, C, G, and D (the second below middle C). It has been superseded by the modern violoncello.

Viola da Gamba. (From Harl. MS.)

The division or solo bass viol, usually known by its Italian name of viola da gamba. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 243.

(b) In organ-building, a stop with metal pipes of narrow scale and ears on the sides of the mouths, giving tones of a penetrating, string-like quality.—Viola d'amore, a kind of bass viol, common in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, having usually seven ordinary gut strings, with from seven to fourteen (or even twenty-four) supplementary strings of metal under the finger-board which sound sympathetically. The gut strings were usually tuned thus: D, A, F♯, D, A, F♯, D (next below middle C). The sympathetic strings, if few, were tuned diatonically in the scale of D, or, if many, chromatically. The tone of the instrument was highly attractive, but the practical difficulties entailed by the numerous sympathetic tones were great, and prevented its use in the orchestra. Also called violet, and sometimes English violet.

Instruments which show these innovations are the quinton, the lyre, and the viola d'amore. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 243.

Viola da spalla. Same as viola da braccio.—Viola di bordone. Same as barytone, 1 (b).—Viola di fagotto. Same as viola bastarda.—Viola pomposa, a species of viola da gamba, invented by J. S. Bach, having five strings, tuned thus: E, A, D, G, C (the second below middle C).

Viola[2] (vī′ō-lä), n. [NL. (Rivinus, 1699, earlier in Brunfels, 1530), < L. viola, violet: see violet.] A genus of plants, type of the family Violaceæ and tribe Violeæ, including the pansies and violets. It is characterized by flowers with nearly equal sepals, these and the lower petal both prolonged at the base, the latter into a spur or sac, and by an ovoid or globose three-valved capsule with roundish seeds. About 300 species have been enumerated, perhaps to be reduced to 200. They are herbs or undershrubs with alternate leaves, persistent stipules, and axillary peduncles. The north temperate species are typically, as in V. odorata, delicate plants of moist shady banks, with rounded crenate leaves on long angular stalks, solitary nodding violet-colored flowers, five orange-yellow anthers forming a central cone, and ovate capsules which open elastically into three boat-like persistent horizontal valves. The stipules are usually conspicuous, often large and leaf-like, in V. tricolor, the pansy, deeply pinnatifid and often larger than the leaves. (See first cut under leaf.) The leaves are of various forms, as cordate, arrow-shaped, lanceolate, rotundate, pedate, etc. The peduncles often bear two flowers, as in V. biflora, the twin-flowered violet, a saxicole species with brilliant golden-yellow flowers, found from the Alps to Cashmere and in the Rocky Mountains. The petals are colored, most often in shades of bluish-purple, white, or yellow, frequently penciled with dark-blue or purple lines. In some species they are of several colors, as in a form of V. pedata, the pansy-violet, or velvet violet, and in V. tricolor, which in its wild state, the heart's-ease, combines purple, yellow, and blue. Many species are dimorphous in their flowers, producing through summer minute apetalous ones which are more fertile and are self-fertilized, a fact first observed by Linnæus in the small mountain species V. mirabilis. In some, as V. Chamissoniana, the common Hawaiian violet, the later flowers, though minute, are well developed and petal-bearing. There are over 80 species in North America, of which about 43, besides 3 introduced, occur in the Northeastern States, and 36 in the Southern, where they diminish southward, only 7 extending into Texas. The native American species are divided into two groups, the stemless violets, chiefly eastern or central, as V. palmata, in which the long-stalked leaves are clustered at the top of a thick fleshy rhizome, which also bears the numerous distinct leafless scapes; and the leafy-stemmed species, as V. canina and V. striata, with spreading or somewhat erect stems bearing numerous leaves, usually on shorter petioles (see cut under violet). Several species produce long runners, as V. blanda, the sweet white violet; V. Canadensis, the largest, reaches sometimes 2 feet high; and V. pedata, the largest-flowered, has the flowers sometimes nearly 2 inches across. The Californian species are chiefly leafy-stemmed, showy, quite local, and peculiar in their yellow flowers with purple veins and brown backs: V. pedunculata, the common species, grows in clustered colonies, with flowers often an inch and a half across; V. ocellata of the Mendocino forests is remarkable for its purple spots. V. Langsdorffii is abundant on the Aleutian Islands, and the genus extends north to Kotzebue Sound. The British species are about 6, of which V. odorata, also occurring from central Europe to Sweden, Siberia, and Cashmere, is the sweet or English violet, often doubled, and called tea-violet in cultivation; and V. canina is the dog- or hedge-violet, without odor, but graceful in form, imparting much of the beauty of spring to English mountain districts. There are 56 species in Europe, over 20 in China, of which V. Patrinii is the most common, and 11 in the mountains of India. In the southern hemisphere, where the species are usually shrubby, there are over 30 in the mountains of South America, elsewhere few, 4 in Australia, of which the chief is V. hederacea, 2 in New Zealand, and 2 in Cape Colony. Five peculiar species occur in the Hawaiian Islands, of which V. robusta produces a woody stem sometimes 5 feet high, and V. helioscopia a large snow-white waxy flower sometimes 2 inches across. A few somewhat shrubby species occur northward, as V. arborescens, the tree-violet. V. scandens of Mexico is a climbing and V. arguta a twining shrub; V. decumbens of Cape Colony, a much-branched procumbent shrub; V. filicaulis of New Zealand, a smooth, slender mountain-creeper. The pansy and other species are of some medicinal use. For V. tricolor, see pansy and heart's-ease (its small form is known in the United States as Johnny-jump-up and lady's-delight). For other species, see violet.

violable (vī′ō-la-bl), a. [= F. violable = Sp. violable = Pg. violavel = It. violabile, < L. violabilis, that may be violated, < violare, violate: see violate.] Capable of being violated, broken, or injured. Bailey.

violably (vī′ō-la-bli), adv. In a violable manner.

Violaceæ (vī-ō-lā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (de Candolle, 1805), fem. pl. of L. violaceus, of a violet, of a violet color: see violaceous.] A family of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants of the order Hypericales. It is characterized by flowers usually with five petals, five sepals, and as many perfect stamens; by anthers nearly or quite connate around the pistil, introrsely dehiscent, and commonly with an appendaged connective; and by a one-celled ovary, commonly with three placentæ and a medium-sized embryo in fleshy albumen. There are about 325 species, belonging to 17 genera, classed in three tribes, of which the types are Viola, Paypayrola, and Rinorea. With the exception of the genus Viola, they consist chiefly of tropical shrubs with deciduous stipules, sometimes small trees, and mostly with but few species in each genus. They usually bear alternate simple entire or toothed leaves, and axillary flowers which are solitary, or form racemose or panicled cymes, followed by capsules which are commonly loculicidal. Their roots often have emetic properties, and in South America many species, especially of Calceolaria, are used as substitutes for ipecacuanha. The family is largely American: two genera, Viola and Calceolaria, occur within the United States. Called Violarieæ by de Candolle.

violaceous (vī-ō-lā′shius), a. [< L. violaceus, of a violet color, < viola, a violet: see violet.] 1. Of a violet color; purple or purplish; blue with a tinge of red.

Red, sometimes violaceous. Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, V. 77.

2. Of, resembling, or pertaining to the plant family Violaceæ.—Violaceous plantain-eater, Musophaga violacea, a turakoo of West Africa from the Cameroons to Senegambia, 17½ inches long, having the general plumage violet-blue, washed with a greenish gloss on some parts; the quills and crown crimson; a bare scarlet patch about the eye, below this a white stripe; the bill orange-red, fading to yellow on the frontal half; the eyes brown; the feet black; and the head not crested. The only other species of the genus, M. rossæ, is rather larger, crested, without any white stripe, and has the bare circumorbital area edged with violet-blue. It inhabits equatorial Africa. M. violacea was so named by Isert in 1789, when the genus was instituted, and is the touraco violet ou masqué of Levaillant, 1806; M. rossæ was named by Gould in 1851.

Violaceous Plantain-eater (Musophaga violacea).

violaceously (vī-ō-lā′shius-li), adv. With a violet color. Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 336.

violaniline (vī-ō-lan′i-lin), n. [< L. viola, violet, + E. aniline.] Same as nigrosine.

Violarieæ (vī″ō-lā-rī′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1805), < Violaria, for Viola, + -eæ.] See Violaceæ.

violascent (vī-ō-las′ent), a. A variant of violescent.

violaster† (vī-ō-las′tėr), n. [ME. violastre, < OF. violastre, F. violâtre, of a violet color, purplish, < viole, violet: see violet.] See the quotation.

There ben also Dyamandes in Ynde, that ben clept Violastres (for here colour is liche Vyolet, or more browne than the Violettes), that ben fulle harde and fulle precyous. Mandeville, Travels, p. 160.

violate (vī′ō-lāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. violated, ppr. violating. [< L. violatus, pp. of violare (> It. violare = Sp. Pg. violar = F. violer), treat with violence, whether bodily or mental, < vis, strength, power, force, violence: see vim, violent.] 1. To treat roughly or injuriously; handle so as to harm or hurt; do violence to; outrage.

An hypocrite, a virgin-violator.
Shak., M. for M., v. 1. 41.

Me the sport of ribald Veterans, mine of ruffian violators!
Tennyson, Boädicea.

viol-block (vī′o̤l-blok), n. A single block or snatch-block, large enough to reeve a small hawser; any large snatch-block.

violet†, v. t. [< OF. violer, < L. violare, violate: see violate.] To violate.

Violeæ (vī-ō′lē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1824), < Viola[2] + -eæ.] A tribe of plants, of the family Violaceæ, characterized by an irregular corolla with the lower petal unlike the others. It includes 7 genera, of which Calceolaria and Viola (the type) are large and widely distributed; of the others, Anchietea includes 4, Corynostylis 1 climbing and Noisettia 1 shrubby species, all of tropical America; 1 other is American and 1 Polynesian.

violence (vī′ō-lens), n. [< ME. violence, < OF. violence, F. violence = Sp. Pg. violencia = It. violenza, < L. violentia, vehemence, impetuosity, ferocity, < violentus, vehement, forcible: see violent.] 1. The state or character of being violent; force; vehemence; intensity.

To be imprisoned in the viewless winds,
And blown with restless violence round about.
Shak., M. for M., iii. 1. 125.

The violence of the lake is so great that it will carry away both man and beast that commeth within it.
Coryat, Crudities, I. 89.

Disturb'd and torn
With violence of this conflict.
Milton, P. L., iv. 995.

2. Highly excited feeling or action; impetuosity; vehemence; eagerness.

Mark me with what violence she first loved the Moor, but for bragging and telling her fantastical lies.
Shak., Othello, ii. 1. 224.

3. Injury done to anything which is entitled to respect, reverence, or observance; profanation; infringement; violation. See the phrases below. —4. Unjust or unwarranted exertion of power; unjust force; force employed against rights, laws, liberty, or the like; outrage; injury; hurt; attack; assault.

To prevent the tyrant's violence.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., iv. 4. 29.

Fie, Master Morose, that you will use this violence to a man of the church! B. Jonson, Epicœne, iii. 2.

5. Ravishment; rape.—6. In law: (a) Any wrongful act of one person, whereby either he or his instrument of wrong-doing is brought into contact with the limbs or body of another person. Robinson. (b) The overcoming or preventing of resistance by exciting fear through display of force. (c) The unlawful use of physical force.—To do violence on†, to attack; murder.

But, as it seems, did violence on herself.
Shak., R. and J., v. 3. 264.

To do violence to or unto, to outrage; force; injure.

He said unto them, Do violence to no man. Luke iii. 14.

They have done violence unto her tomb,
Not granting rest unto her in the grave.
Beau. and Fl., Knight of Malta, v. 2.

=Syn. 1 and 2. Passion, fury, fierceness, wildness, rage, boisterousness.

violence† (vī′ō-lens), v. t. [< violence, v.] 1. To do violence to; assault; injure.

Mrs. Fitz. It may beget some favour like excuse,
Though none like reason.
Wit. No, my tuneful mistress?
Then surely love hath none, nor beauty any;
Nor nature, violenced in both of these.
B. Jonson, Devil is an Ass, ii. 2.

2. To bring by violence; compel.

Like our late misnam'd high court of justice, to which the loyal and the noble, the honest and the brave, were violenc'd by ambition and malice. Feltham, Resolves, ii. 64.

violency (vī′ō-len-si), n. [As violence (see -cy).] Same as violence. Jer. Taylor, Rule of Conscience, III. ii. 3.

violent (vī′ō-lent), a. and n. [< ME. violent, vyolent, < OF. violent, F. violent = Sp. Pg. It. violento, < L. violentus, vehement, forcible, < vis, strength, power, force: see vim.] I. a. 1. Characterized by strong and sudden physical force; impetuous; furious.

Our fortunes lie a bleeding by your rash
And violent onset. Lust's Dominion, iv. 2.

Violent fires soon burn out themselves.
Shak., Rich. II., ii. 1. 34.

2. Produced, effected, or continued by force; accompanied by extraneous or unnatural force; unnatural.

No violent state can be perpetual. T. Burnet.

Truly I don't Care to discourage a young Man—he has a violent Death in his Face; but I hope no Danger of Hanging. Congreve, Love for Love, ii. 7.

3. Acting or produced by unlawful, unjust, or improper force; characterized by force or violence unlawfully exercised; rough; outrageous; not authorized.

Then laid they violent hands upon him; next Himself imprisoned, and his goods asseized. Marlowe, Edw. II., i. 2.

We would give much to use violent thefts.
Shak., T. and C., v. 3. 21.

When with a violent hand you made me yours,
I curs'd the doer.
Fletcher (and another), Sea Voyage, ii. 1.

4. Vehement mentally, or springing from such vehemence; fierce; passionate; furious.

Let down your anger! Is not this our sovereign?
The head of mercy and of law? who dares, then,
But rebels scorning law, appear thus violent?
Fletcher, Loyal Subject, iv. 7.

His Love, however violent it might appear, was still founded in Reason. Addison, Spectator, No. 345.

Indeed, my Dear, you'll tear another Fan, if you don't mitigate those violent Airs.
Congreve, Way of the World, iii. 11.

5. In general, intense in any respect; extreme: as, a violent contrast; especially, of pain, acute.

Discreet maistris seyn that the feuere agu comounly is causid of a uyolent reed coler adust, and of blood adust, and of blak coler adust.
Book of Quinte Essence (ed. Furnivall), p. 22.

It was the violentest Fit of Contagion that ever was for the Time in this Island. Howell, Letters, I. iv. 24.

The king's whole army, encamped along the sides of this river, were taken with violent sickness after eating the fish caught in it. Bruce, Source of the Nile, II. 235.

Rouge, if too violent, by a natural law of color causes the planes of the cheeks to recede from the planes of the other and whiter portions of the face, thus producing a look of age and of gauntness. The Century, XXXV. 539.

6. Compelled; compulsory; not voluntary.

All violent marriages engender hatred betwixt the married. Guevara, Letters (tr. by Hellowes, 1577), p. 297.

Ease would recant
Vows made in pain, as violent and void.
Milton, P. L., iv. 97.

Violent motion†. See motion.—Violent power. See power[1].—Violent profits, in Scots law, the penalty due on a tenant's forcibly or unwarrantably retaining possession after he ought to have removed. =Syn. 1. Turbulent, boisterous.—5. Poignant, exquisite.

II.† n. One acting with violence.

Such violents shall not take heaven, but hell, by force.
Decay of Christian Piety, p. 53. (Latham.) violent† (vī′ō-lent), v. [< violent, a.] I. trans. To urge with violence.

I find not the least appearance that his former adversaries violented any thing against him under that queen.
Fuller, Worthies, III. 510.

II. intrans. To act or work with violence; be violent.

This grief is fine, full, perfect, that I taste,
And violenteth in a sense as strong
As that which causeth. Shak., T. and C., iv. 4. 4.

violently (vī′ō-lent-li), adv. In a violent manner; by violence; by force; forcibly; vehemently; outrageously.

They must not deny that there is to be found in nature another agent able to analyse compound bodies less violently, and both more genuinely and more universally, than the fire. Boyle, Works, I. 486.

The king, at the head of the cavalry, fell so suddenly and so violently upon them that he broke through the van-guard commanded by Melca Christos, and put them to flight before his foot could come up.
Bruce, Source of the Nile, II. 393.

During the siege of Valenciennes by the allied armies in June, 1793, the weather, which had been remarkably hot and dry, became violently rainy after the cannonading commenced. Sci. Amer., N. S., LXIII. 385.

violer† (vī′o̤l-ėr), n. [< viol + -er[1].] One skilled in playing on the viol; also, a violinist.

To the Frenche violer for his quarters paye, 12*li.* 10*s.*
Prince Henry's Book of Payments (1609). (Nares.)

One . . . stabs a violer . . . because he was serenading in the night-time with his fiddle.
Fountainhall, Decisions of the Lords of Council and [Session, I. 364. (Jamieson.) violescent (vī-ō-les′ent), a. [< L. viola, a violet, a purple color (see violet[1]), + -escent.] Tending to a violet color.

violet[1] (vī′ō-let), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also violette; < ME. violet, vyolet, vialet, vyalett, violette, < OF. violette, f., violet, m., F. violette = Sp. Pg. violeta = It. violetta, dim. of L. viola (It. Sp. Pg. viola, OF. viole), a violet, a dim. form, akin to Gr. ἰον (Fίον*), a violet.] I. n. 1. A plant of the genus Viola, or one of its flowers; also, one of a few plants of other genera. See Viola, compound names below, and cut in next column.

Daisies pied and violets blue. Shak., L. L. L., v. 2. 904.

2. A general class of colors, of which the violet-flower is a highly chromatic example. In the spectrum the violet extends from h to H, covering all the upper part of the spectrum ordinarily visible. This color can be produced by a slight admixture of red to blue; and colors somewhat more red than the upper part of the spectrum are called violet. But the sensation of violet is produced by a pure blue whose chroma has been diminished while its luminosity has been increased. Thus, blue and violet are the same color, though the sensations are different. A mere increase of illumination may cause a violet blue to appear violet, with a diminution of apparent chroma. This color, called violet or blue according to the quality of the sensation it excites, is one of the three fundamental colors of Young's theory. It is nearly complementary to the color of brightness, so that deep shades generally appear by contrast of a violet tinge; and the light of a rainy day, and still more of a sudden tempest, has a violet appearance. Even the pure yellow of the spectrum, so reduced as to be barely visible, looks violet beside the same light in great intensity.

1, Stemmed Violet (Viola tricolor, var. arvensis): St, stem.
2, Stemless Violet (Viola cucullata): s, scape.

3. Any one of the many different small blue or violet butterflies of Lycæna, Polyommatus, and allied genera.—Acid violet, a coal-tar color used in dyeing, being the sodium salt of di-methyl-rosaniline trisulphonic acid. It is applicable to wool and silk.—Aniline violet. Same as mauve.—Arrow-leafed violet, Viola sagittata of the eastern half of the United States, much resembling the common blue violet, except in the form of its leaves.—Bird's-foot violet, a low stemless species, Viola pedata, of the same region, having pedately divided leaves, and fine large light-blue or whitish flowers, yellow-eyed with the stamens. A variety is the pansy violet.—Calathian violet, the marsh-gentian, Gentiana Pneumonanthe. According to Gerard, the true plant was a Campanula. Britten and Holland.—Canada violet, Viola Canadensis, a species common northward and in the mountains of eastern North America, having an upright stem a foot or two high, and white petals purplish beneath.—Common or early blue violet, Viola palmata, very common in moist ground in North America. The leaves are more or less palmately lobed. The size and shape of the leaves are variable, as also the color of the petals, which are deep- or pale-blue, or purple, or sometimes white or variegated.—Corn-violet. See Specularia.—Crystal violet. See crystal.—Damask violet. Same as dame's-violet.—Dog-tooth violet, a plant of the genus Erythronium. The yellow dog-tooth violet is E. Americanum.—Dog-violet, Viola canina of the northern old world, and Viola Labradorica of North America. It is a stemmed violet a few inches high, with light-violet petals and a short cylindrical spur.—English violet. See sweet violet, below.—Fringe or fringed violet, Arthropodium paniculatum and Chlamysporum tuberosum, liliaceous plants of Australia with rather small panicled blue flowers, those of the former with crisped inner segments.—Green violet. See Ionidium.—Hoffmann's violet. Same as dahlia, 3.—Hooded violet, a plant of the tropical American genus Calyptrion, related to the violets.—Horned violet (or pansy), Viola cornuta of southern Europe, having pale-blue or mauve-colored sweet-scented spurred flowers, produced abundantly and continuously, long cultivated in Europe, and forming an excellent border- or bedding-plant.—Lance-leafed violet, the American Viola lanceolata, with small white flowers.—Long-spurred violet, Viola rostrata of the eastern and central United States, having a low stem and pale-violet flowers with a slender spur.—Manganese violet, in ceram., the purple color obtained by the use of manganese.—March violet, the sweet violet. Britten and Holland. [Local, Eng.]—Marian's violet. Same as mariet.—Marsh-violet. (a) Viola palustris, a species with small blue flowers marked with purple: found northward in both hemispheres. (b) Locally, same as bog-violet.—Mars violet, an artificially prepared oxid of iron, used as a pigment by artists. It resembles Indian red, but is darker in color. Also called mineral purple.—Mercury's violet. Same as Marian's violet, above.—Naphthalene violet. Same as naphthameïn.—Neapolitan violet. See sweet violet, below.—New fast violet. Same as gallocyanine.—New Holland violet. Same as spurless violet, below.—Pale violet, Viola striata of central and eastern North America, a stemmed species having white petals lined with purple.—Pansy violet, a local name for a form of the bird's-foot violet, Viola pedata. The two upper petals are of a deep-violet color and as if velvety. Also velvet violet.—Paris violet. Same as methyl-violet.—Perkin's violet. Same as indisin.—Primrose-leafed violet, Viola primulæfolia of the eastern United States, with small white flowers.—Rosaniline violet a coal-tar color used in dyeing, being the hydrochlorids of mono- and di-phenyl-rosaniline. They produce a dull but moderately fast violet color on cotton, wool, and silk. Also called phenyl violet, spirit violet, Parma violet, imperial violet, etc.—Round-leafed violet, Viola rotundifolia of cold woods in eastern North America, a species with small yellow flowers, the leaves at first erect, roundish-ovate, an inch broad, in summer 3 or 4 inches long, lying flat on the ground, shining above.—Sand violet Viola arenaria, a small tufted stemless species with pale-blue flowers, found in the northern Old World.—Spurless violet, specifically, Viola hederacea of Australasia, once classed as a distinct genus Erpetion, a tufted or widely creeping plant with rather small blue flowers.—Spurred violet, a pretty South

European species, Viola calcarata, allied to the horned violet, and having large purple flowers, which in the Alps sometimes form sheets of color.—Stemless violets, that class of violets in which the stem does not rise above the ground, the flowers being borne on scapes. See cut above.—Stemmed violets, that class of violets which have a leafy stem and usually large stipules. See cut above.—Sweet violet, a favorite sweet-scented violet, Viola odorata, native in Europe and Asiatic Russia: in America often called English violet. It is a stemless species with bluish-purple or white flowers, cultivated in many varieties, single and double, and produced in large quantities for the market, yielding also a perfumers' oil. A continuously blooming variety is much grown about Paris. The Neapolitan is a well-known variety with double light-blue flowers, now surpassed by the "Marie Louise." The flowers of the "czar" are very large and sweet; those of the "queen-of-violets," white and very large; etc.—Tongue-violet. See Schweiggeria.—Tooth-violet. Same as coral-wort, 1.—Tree-violet, Viola arborescens, a shrubby species with erect branching stems, growing from crevices of rocks in the western Mediterranean region.—Tri-colored violet, the pansy, Viola tricolor.—Trinity violet, the spiderwort, Tradescantia Virginiana, from its blue flowers and time of blooming. Britten and Holland. [Local, Eng.]—Twin-flowered violet. See Viola.—Velvet violet. See pansy violet, above.—Violet family, the plant-family Violaceæ.—Violet-powder, starch reduced to a very fine powder, and scented with orris-powder or other perfume: used for nursery and other purposes. (See also bog-violet, hedge-violet, horse-violet, methyl-violet, water-violet, wood-violet.)

II. a. Having the color of violet, a deep blue tinged with red.—Violet bee, a European carpenter-bee, Xylocopa violacea. See cut under carpenter-bee.—Violet carmine, a brilliant bluish-purple pigment obtained from the roots of the alkanet, Alkanna (Anchusa) tinctoria. It is little used, as it changes color rapidly on exposure.—Violet land-crab, the West Indian crab Gecarcinus ruricola.—Violet quartz, amethyst.—Violet sapphire, schorl, etc. See the nouns.—Violet tanager, Euphonia violacea, partly of the color said.

violet[2] (vī′ō-let), n. [< It. viola, a viol.] A viola d'amore. Sometimes called English violet.

violet-blindness (vī′ō-let-blīnd″nes), n. A form of color-blindness in which there is inability to distinguish violet.

violet-blue (vī′ō-let-blö), n. See blue.

violet-cress (vī′ō-let-kres), n. A Spanish cruciferous plant, Ionopsidium acaule.

violet-ear, violet-ears (vī′ō-let-ēr, -ērz), n. A humming-bird of the genus Petasophora. Six species are described, ranging from Mexico to Brazil and Bolivia, as P. anaïs and P. cyanotis. They are rather large hummers, 4¼ to 5¼ inches long, with metallic-blue ear-coverts (whence the name).

violet-shell (vī′ō-let-shel), n. A gastropod of the family Ianthinidæ. See cut under Ianthina.

violet-snail (vī′ō-let-snāl), n. Same as violet-shell.

violet-tip (vī′ō-let-tip), n. A handsome American butterfly, Polygonia interrogationis, whose wings are reddish with brown mottlings and violet tips. Its larva feeds on hop, elm, and nettle. S. H. Scudder.

violet-wood (vī′ō-let-wůd), n. 1. Same as king-wood.—2. See myall.—3. The wood of a leguminous tree of Guiana, Copaiva bracteata.

violin[1] (vī-ō-lin′), n. [= Sp. violín = Pg. violino = G. violine = Sw. Dan. violin, < It. violino, dim. of viola, a viol: see viol[1]. Cf. F. violon, a violin.] 1. The modern form of the smaller medieval viola da braccio. The violin group of instruments is distinguished from the true viols especially by having the back slightly arched like the belly, and by the number and tuning of the strings. It is probable that the change from the viol model was first made in the tenor viol, or viola, and thence transferred to the smaller size, or violino. The true violin, both large and small, began to be made about the middle of the sixteenth century, particularly in the North Italian towns of Cremona and Brescia. The greatest refinement of shape and construction was attained about 1700 by Stradivari, and has never since been surpassed. In its most approved form, the violin is further distinguished from the viol by a comparative thinness between belly and back, by sides or ribs of a peculiar shape, by bouts (indentations in the sides to facilitate the use of the bow) between double corners, by a finely adjusted correlation of position between the bridge, the sound-post, and the f-shaped sound-holes, by the complete independence of the neck from the body, by a peg-box with transverse pegs, and by a daintily carved scroll for a head. Four strings are used, tuned thus: E, A, D, and G (next below middle C), of which the lowest is wound with silver wire, while the others are of gut. The first string is often called the chanterelle. In Violin.

A, scroll; B, pegs; C, peg-box; D, upper saddle; E, finger-board; F, sound-hole; G, bridge; H, tail-piece; I, tail-piece ring; K, tail-piece button; M, neck; N, neck-plate; O, back; P, front or belly; R, R, bouts; S, waist. Inside the violin has six blocks (namely, neck-block, end-pin block, and four corner-blocks), twelve hoop-linings, a bass-bar, and a sound-post.

the construction of the instrument maple and pine, very carefully selected, are the chief components. The minutest details of wood, model, jointing, varnish, etc., are important, so that a really fine instrument is an elaborate work of art. The bow by which the violin is sounded has also been gradually refined in shape, so as to present the utmost strength, elasticity, and lightness (see bow[2], 3 (a)). In actual use the violin is held nearly horizontally by the player's extended left arm, the lower part of the body being supported on his left collar-bone. The first position of his left hand is so close to the nut that the pressure of the first finger on any one of the strings will raise its pitch a half-step, that of the second finger will raise it a whole step, etc. The second position, or half shift, is one in which the first finger falls where the second did in the first position. The third position, or whole shift, is one in which the first finger falls where the second did in the second position. (See position, 4 (c), and shift, 2.) Eleven different positions are recognized, so that the compass of the instrument, which in the first position extends only to two octaves and a major third, reaches by means of other positions to nearly four octaves. Harmonics are producible by lightly touching a string at one of its nodes, so that the available compass is still longer. The tone of the violin is more capable of expression than that of any other instrument: hence it holds the leading position in the modern orchestra, the central section of which is made up of the first and second violins, the violas, and the violoncellos, all of which are essentially violins in model. It is also a favorite instrument for solos, both with and without accompaniment. While the pitch of the tones used is determined by the stopping of the strings with the left hand, their force and quality—that is, their expressiveness—depends on the method of bowing. To a certain extent, two or even three strings may be sounded together, so as to produce harmonic effects: such playing is called double-stopping. Pizzicato tones are produced by plucking the strings with the finger, after the manner of the guitar. A peculiar veiled tone is obtained by attaching a weight called a mute or sordino to the bridge so as to check its vibrations. The violin is often colloquially called a fiddle.

Sharp violins proclaim
Their jealous pangs and desperation.
Dryden, Ode for St. Cecilia's Day, st. 5.

2. A player on the violin; a violinist: as, the first violin of an orchestra.—Key-stop violin. See key-stop.—Keyed violin. See keyed.—Nail-violin. Same as nail-fiddle.—Tenor violin. See viola.—Three-quarter violin. Same as violino piccolo.—Violin clef, in musical notation, a G clef on the second line of the staff; the treble clef. See figure.—Violin diapason, in organ-building, a diapason of unusually narrow scale and string-like tone.—Violin-players' cramp or palsy, an occupation-neurosis of violin-players, similar to writers' cramp (which see, under writer).

violin[2] (vī′ō-lin), n. [< Viola[2] + -in[2].] An emetic substance contained in all parts of the sweet-scented violet, Viola odorata. It may be identical with emetin. Boiled with dilute acids, it yields quercetin and glucose.

violina (vē-ō-lē′nä), n. [< violin[1].] In organ-building, a stop having narrow metal pipes, and thin, incisive, string-like quality. It is usually of four-feet tone.

violin-bow (vī-ō-lin′bō), n. A bow for sounding a violin.

violine (vī′ō-lin), n. [< L. viola, a violet color, + -ine[2].] A blue precipitate obtained by treating aniline with sulphuric acid and peroxid of lead: same as mauve.

violinette (vī″ō-li-net′), n. [< violin + -ette.] Same either as violino piccolo or as kit[5].

violinist (vī-ō-lin′ist), n. [= G. Sw. Dan. violinist = Sp. Pg. It. violinista; as violin + -ist. Cf. F. violoniste.] A performer on the violin.

violino (vē-ō-lē′nō), n. [It.: see violin[1].] Same as violin.—Violino piccolo, a small or miniature violin, differing from the kit in being of the same proportions as the violin; a three-quarter fiddle. Such violins were once used for children's practice. They were usually tuned a third higher than the violin.

violin-piano (vī-ō-lin′pi-an″ō), n. Same as harmonichord.

violist (vī′ō-list), n. [= D. violist; as viol + -ist.] 1. A performer on the viol.

He [Kenelm Digby] was a violinist, and the two former violists. Life of A. Wood, Feb. 12, 1658–9.

2. A performer on the viola.

violoncellist (vē″ō-lon-chel′ist or vī″ō-lon-sel′-ist), n. [= It. violoncellista; as violoncello + -ist.] A performer on the violoncello. Often abbreviated to cellist, 'cellist.

violoncello (vē″ō-lon-chel′ō or vī″ō-lon-sel′ō), n. [It., dim. of violone, q. v.] 1. The modern form of the medieval viola da gamba. It is properly a bass violin rather than a small violone, as its name suggests, since its form is that of the violin rather than of the true viol. Its size is about double that of the violin. It began to be popular for concerted music early in the seventeenth century, and for solo use about a century later. Its four strings are tuned thus: A, D, G, C (the second below middle C), the third and fourth being silver strings. In playing, the violoncello is rested vertically by means of a wooden peg or standard on the floor between the player's knees. The method of playing is otherwise very similar to that of the violin, including the same special effects. The tone is very sonorous and expressive, combining the advantages of the violin tone with the breadth of a tenor compass. The bow used is similar to that for the violin, but larger. In modern music the violoncello stands next in importance, among the stringed instruments, to the violin, both as a member of the orchestra and as a solo instrument. Commonly abbreviated cello, 'cello.

2. In organ-building, a pedal stop of eight-feet tone, having metal pipes of narrow scale and a very string-like quality.—Violoncello piccolo, a small or miniature violoncello, having the same proportions and tuning. It was used especially for solos.

violone (vē-ō-lō′ne), n. [= F. violon (dim.), a violin, < It. violone, aug. of viola, a viol: see viol.] 1. The largest of the medieval viols; a double-bass viol. It was originally a very large viola da gamba, sometimes provided with six strings, but usually with only three or four. The three-stringed form was tuned thus: G, D, A (the third below middle C), which is the tuning of the modern three-stringed double-bass, with which the violone is nearly identical.

2. In organ-building, a pedal stop of sixteen-feet tone, resembling the violoncello.

violous† (vī′ō-lus), a. [< viol(ent) + -ous.] Violent; impetuous. [Rare.]

Gil. Where's your son?
Fra. He shall be hang'd in flots;
The dogs shall eat him in Lent; there's cats' meat
And dogs' meat enough about him. . . .
Gil. You are so violous!
Fletcher and Rowley, Maid in the Mill, iii. 1.

viparious (vī-pā′ri-us), a. [Irreg. < L. vita, life, or vivus, alive, + parere, produce. Cf. viper and viviparous.] Life-producing or life-renewing. [Rare.]

A cat the most viparious is limited to nine lives.
Bulwer, Caxtons, xii. 2.

★viper (vī′pėr), n. [< OF. vipere, F. vipère (also OF. wivre, F. givre) = Sp. víbora = Pg. vibora = It. vipera, < L. vipera, a viper, adder, serpent, contr. for vivipara*, fem. of an adj. found in LL. as viviparus, bringing forth alive (applied to some fish, as distinguished from oviparous fish), < vivus, alive, + parere, bring forth. Cf vire[1] and wiver, wivern, from the same source. See weever.] 1. A venomous snake of the family Viperidæ: originally and especially applied to the only serpent of this kind occurring in the greater part of Europe, Vipera communis or Pelias berus. This is the only poisonous reptile which is found in Great Britain, and there it is neither very common nor very dangerous. There are several genera and many species of vipers properly so called, all Old World, chiefly of warm countries, all poisonous, and most of them very dangerous if not fatal; they are known indifferently as vipers, asps, or adders. See Viperidæ, and cuts under adder, Cerastes, and daboya.

Head and Tail of Common Viper (Pelias berus), with erect fangs.

2. Any venomous serpent except a rattlesnake; a viperine; a cobriform and not crotali-

form serpent, as a cobra, asp, or adder; also, loosely, any serpent that is venomous, or supposed to be so; a dangerous, repulsive, or ugly snake. In the United States the name is commonly but erroneously applied to various spotted snakes, especially to some supposed to be venomous, but in fact innocuous: as, the water-viper, Ancistrodon piscivorus, the water-moccasin, poisonous; the blowing-viper and black viper, Heterodon platyrhinos and H. niger, both harmless, though of formidable and repulsive aspect. See cuts under asp, cobra-de-capello, copperhead, moccasin, and pit-viper.

3. In her., a serpent used as a bearing. Some writers avoid the word serpent and use viper instead, there being no difference in the representations.

4. One who or that which is mischievous or malignant.

> Where is that viper? bring the villain forth.
> Shak., Othello, v. 2. 285.
>
> Thou painted viper!
> Beast that thou art!
> Shelley, The Cenci, i. 3.

Black viper. See def. 2.—Blowing-viper. Same as hognose-snake. [U. S.]—Horned viper, any serpent of the genus Cerastes.—Indian viper, the Russellian snake. See cut under daboya.—Pit viper. See pit-viper.—Plumed viper, a puff-adder. See Clotho.—Red viper. Same as copperhead, 1.—Viper's dance, St. Vitus's dance. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]—Water-viper. See def. 2.—Yellow viper. See yellow.

Vipera (vī'pe-rä), n. [NL. (Laurenti, 1768), < L. vipera, a viper: see viper.] A genus of serpents, giving name to the Viperidæ. Formerly it was applied with little discrimination to a great number of venomous viviparous species and others. It is now restricted to a small genus of the family Viperidæ, of which the common viper of Europe (V. aspis, V. communis or Pelias berus) is the type, having the urosteges two-rowed and the nostril between two plates. Also called Pelias. See Viperidæ, and cuts under adder and viper.

viperess (vī'pėr-es), n. [< viper + -ess.] A female viper.

> Would we fain'd, but hear Pontia confess,
> My Sons I would have poyson'd: Viperess!
> Stapylton, tr. of Juvenal (ed. 1660), vi. 670.

viper-fish (vī'pėr-fish), n. A fish of the family Chauliodontidæ and genus Chauliodus, specifically C. sloani. This is a deep-sea fish of Mediterranean and Atlantic waters, a foot long, greenish above, blackish below, silvery on the sides, with about thirty phosphorescent spots in a row from the chin to the ventral fins.

viper-gourd (vī'pėr-gōrd), n. Same as snake-gourd. See gourd.

Viperidæ (vī-per'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Vipera + -idæ.] The vipers; one of four families into which the suborder Viperina or Solenoglypha, of the order Ophidia, is divided, distinguished from the Crotalidæ by the absence of a pit between the eye and the nostrils, and from the Atractaspididæ and Causidæ by the presence of a postfrontal bone in connection with ungrooved fangs. All the Viperidæ are venomous, and nearly all inhabit the Old World only. According to the latest view of the family, it includes 7 genera: Vipera, of which Pelias is a synonym; Daboia (see daboya); Cerastes, the horned vipers; Bitis (with which Echidna is synonymous); Clotho, the plumed vipers, or puff-adders, as C. arietans of Africa; Echis of Merrem, called Toxicoa by Gray; and Atheris of Cope, also called Pœcilostolus. In the two latter the urosteges are single-rowed; in the rest, two-rowed. The generic distinctions of the first five are slight, chiefly resting upon the formation of the plates about the nostrils. See also cuts cited under viper, 1.

Plumed Viper, or Puff-adder (Clotho arietans), one of the Viperidæ.

viperiform (vī'pe-ri-fôrm), a. [< L. vipera, a viper, + forma, form.] Having the form or structure of a viper; allied or belonging to the vipers: correlated with cobriform and crotaliform.

Viperina (vī-pe-rī'nä), n. pl. [NL., < L. vipera, a viper, + -ina[2].] I†. A general name of venomous serpents: distinguished from Colubrina. Also called Nocua, Thanatophidia, Venenosa.—2. More exactly, one of two suborders of Ophidia, containing venomous serpents related to the viper. It corresponds to the modern suborder Solenoglypha, as distinguished from Proteroglypha, though of less exact definition than either of these. See cut under rattlesnake, and cuts cited under viper, 2.

viperine (vī'pe-rin), a. and n. [< L. viperinus, of or like a viper, < vipera, a viper, serpent: see viper.] I. a. Resembling or related to the viper; of or pertaining to the Viperina, especially in the narrower sense: broadly distinguished from colubrine, more strictly contrasted with crotaline.—Viperine snake. (a) Any member of the Viperina. (b) A harmless colubrine serpent of Europe, Tropidonotus viperina, colored much like the true viper. See cut under snake.

II. n. A member of the Viperina; a viper. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 198.

viperish (vī'pėr-ish), a. [< viper + -ish[1].] Like a viper; somewhat viperous; malignant; ugly: as, a viperish old woman.

viperling (vī'pėr-ling), n. [< viper + -ling[1].] A young or small viper.

viperoid (vī'pe-roid), a. [< viper + -oid.] Viperine in a broad sense; of or pertaining to the Viperoidea.

Viperoidea, Viperoides (vī-pe-roi'dē-ä, -dēz), n. pl. [NL.: see viperoid.] Same as Viperina, 1.

viperous (vī'pėr-us), a. [< viper + -ous.] Having the qualities of a viper; viperish; venomous; malignant; spiteful: chiefly said of mental qualities, or used figuratively.

> Which, though it repeopled the world, yet is it least beholding to her viperous offspring.
> Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 340.
>
> Mr. Chubb cast a suspicious and viperous glance at Felix, who felt that he had been a simpleton for his pains.
> George Eliot, Felix Holt, xi.

viperously (vī'pėr-us-li), adv. In a viperous manner; like a viper.

> Hauing spoken as maliciouslie & viperouslie as he might . . . of Wikliffes life. Holinshed, Richard II., an. 1377.

viper's-bugloss (vī'pėrz-bū"glos), n. See Echium.

viper's-grass (vī'pėrz-gräs), n. See Scorzonera.

viper-wine (vī'pėr-wīn), n. See the quotation.

> When his [Sir Robert Cotton's] abilities decayed, he drank sack in which snakes were dissolved, being commonly called viper-wine, to restore nature.
> Court and Times of Charles I., II. 112, note.

viraginian (vir-ā-jin'i-an), a. [< L. virago (-gin-), a bold woman, + -ian.] Having the qualities of a virago; termagant.

> The remembrance of his old conversation among the viraginian trollops. Milton, Apology for Smectymnuus.

viraginity (vir-ā-jin'i-ti), n. [< L. virago (-gin-), a bold woman, + -ity.] The qualities of a virago. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.

viraginous (vi-raj'i-nus), a. [< L. virago (-gin-), a bold woman, + -ous.] Same as viraginian.

> A man is placed in the same uneasy situation as before described [riding the stang], so that he may be supposed to represent . . . his henpecked friend. . . . He is carried through the whole hamlet, with a view of exposing or shaming the viraginous lady.
> Brockett, Gloss. of North Country Words, p. 206.

virago (vi- or vī-rā'gō), n. [< L. virago, a bold woman, a man-like woman, an Amazon, < vir, man: see virile.] 1. A woman of extraordinary stature, strength, and courage; a woman who has the robust body and masculine mind of a man; a female warrior.

> She . . . procedeth like a Virago stoutly and cherefully to the fire, where the corps of her husbande was burnte, castinge her selfe into the same fyre.
> R. Eden, tr. of Sebastian Munster (First Books on America, ed. Arber, p. 24).
>
> "To arms, to arms!" the fierce virago cries,
> And swift as lightning to the combat flies.
> Pope, R. of the L., v. 37.

Hence—2. A bold, impudent, turbulent woman; a termagant: now the usual meaning.

> When I distress her so again, may I lose her forever! and be linked instead to some antique virago, whose gnawing passions, and long hoarded spleen, shall make me curse my folly. Sheridan, The Rivals, iii. 2.

3. [cap.] [NL. (A. Newton, 1871).] A genus of Anatinæ: so called because the female has a peculiarity of the windpipe usually found only in male ducks. The species is V. punctata (or castanea) of Australia.

virago-sleeve† (vi-rā'gō-slēv), n. A full sleeve worn by women about the middle of the seventeenth century.

Virchow-Robin lymph-spaces. The spaces between the adventitia and the inner coats of the cerebral vessels.

vire[1]† (vēr), n. [< ME. vyre, < OF. vire = Pr. Sp. Pg. vira, a crossbow-bolt; cf. dim. Sp. virote, It. verretta, veretta, a spear; prob. a contraction of Sp. víbora = Pg. vibora, a viper, = OF. vivre*, also wivre (> E. wiver), F. givre, a serpent, viper, also an arrow, < L. vipera, a viper: see viper and wiver. The supposed contraction may have been due to association with OF. virer, turn.] 1. A bolt for a crossbow, feathered spirally so as to rotate in its flight. Also vireton.

> The head of a vire or veron, a heavy arrow which was discharged from a large cross-bow.
> H. S. Cuming, Jour. Brit. Archæol. Ass., XI. 143.

2. In her., same as annulet. Cussans.

vire[2]† (vēr), v. An obsolete spelling of veer.

virelay (vir'e-lā), n. [< F. virelai, < virer, turn, change direction (see veer), + lai, a song, lay: see lay[3].] An old French form of poem, in short lines, running on two rimes; also, a succession of stanzas on two rimes, and of indeterminate length, the rime of the last line of each becoming the rime of the first couplet in the next, thus: a, a, b, a, a, b, a, a, b; b, b, c, b, b, c, b, b, c; c, c, d, c, c, d, c, c, d; etc. In a nine-line lay the rime-order is as follows: a, a, b, a, a, b, a, a, b. The virelai nouveau is written on two rimes throughout; and the lines of the first couplet reappear alternately at irregular intervals throughout the poem, concluding it in reverse order. No rime should be repeated. [This form has been written in English but sparingly. Except by example, it is difficult to explain it. Here is the beginning of one:

> Good-bye to the Town!—good-bye!
> Hurrah! for the sea and the sky!
>
> In the street the flower-girls cry;
> In the street the water-carts ply;
> And a fluter, with features a-wry,
> Plays fitfully, "Scots, wha hae"—
> And the throat of that fluter is dry;
> Good-bye to the Town!—good-bye!
>
> And over the roof-tops nigh
> Come a waft like a dream of the May,—etc.

The next paragraph closing with:

> Hurrah! for the sea and the sky!
> A. Dobson, July.]

> Of swich matere made he many layes,
> Songes, compleintes, roundels, virelayes.
> Chaucer, Franklin's Tale, l. 220.
>
> Virelay. Round, Freeman's Song. Cotgrave, 1611.
>
> Virelay, a roundelay, Country-ballad, or Freemans song.
> Blount, 1670.
>
> And then the band of flutes began to play,
> To which a lady sung a virelay.
> Dryden, Flower and Leaf, l. 365.

virent (vī'rent), a. [< L. viren(t-)s, ppr. of virere, be green, fresh, or vigorous. Cf. virid, verd, verdant, etc.] Green; verdant; fresh.

> In these, yet fresh and virent, they carve out the figures of men and women. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 6.

★Vireo (vir'ē-ō), n. [NL., < L. vireo, a kind of bird, a greenfinch.] 1. A genus of small greenish oscine or singing passerine birds of America, the type of the family Vireonidæ, and including most of the species of that family; the greenlets. See Vireonidæ, and cuts under greenlet and solitary.—2. [l. c.] A greenlet; any bird of the family Vireonidæ, especially of the genus Vireo.—Arizona vireo, the gray vireo. Baird, Brewer, and Ridgway, 1874.—Bell's vireo, V. belli, a very small greenlet of the United States from Illinois westward, and south into Mexico, discovered by Audubon on the upper Missouri, and named by him in 1844 after John Bell, a New York taxidermist.—Black-capped or black-headed vireo, V. atricapillus, a rare and remarkable greenlet found from Texas to Mazatlan and southward, first described by Dr. S. W. Woodhouse in 1852 from specimens he procured on the San Pedro river. It has the cap jet-black, unlike any other vireo.—Black-whiskered vireo, one of the mustached greenlets, V. barbatulus, of Florida and the West Indies. See whip-tom-kelly.—Blue-headed vireo, the solitary vireo, whose cap is somewhat bluish, in contrast with the greenish of the other upper parts.—Cassin's vireo, the western variety of the solitary vireo. Xantus, 1859.—Gray vireo, V. vicinior, an isolated species discovered in Arizona by Coues in 1864.—Hutton's vireo, V. huttoni, a relative of the white-eye, found in California and Mexico. Cassin, 1851.—Lead-colored vireo, the plumbeous vireo. Baird, Brewer, and Ridgway, 1874.—Least vireo, V. pusillus, a very small greenlet discovered by Coues in 1864 in Arizona, and related to the gray and Bell's vireos.—Mustached vireo, one of several of the larger species which have maxillary streaks, especially the black-whiskered, or whip-tom-kelly.—Philadelphia vireo, the brotherly-love greenlet, discovered by John Cassin near the city of that name, and originally described by him in 1851 as Vireosylvia philadelphica. It belongs with the redeye in the slender-billed section of the large vireos, but in coloration is almost identical with the warbling vireo. It inhabits eastern parts of North America, north to Hudson's Bay, and extends to Guatemala in winter. It is more abundant in the Mississippi watershed than where originally found.—Plumbeous vireo, V. plumbeus, of the southern Rocky Mountain region and southward, discovered by Coues in Arizona in 1864. It resembles the solitary greenlet, but is much duller in color; the length is 6 inches.—Red-eyed vireo, the redeye (see cut under greenlet). Also called red-eyed flycatcher (after Catesby, 1771, Latham, Pennant, etc.), and formerly olive-colored flycatcher (Edwards).—Solitary vireo. See solitary.—Vigors's vireo†. Same as Vigors's warbler (which see, under warbler).—Warbling vireo, V. gilvus, of all temperate eastern North America and southward. It is one of the smaller species, about 5 inches long and 8½ in extent, and very plainly colored; it inhabits high woodland, and has an exquisitely melodious warble, often heard from the shade and ornamental trees of parks and cities.—White-eyed vireo, V. noveboracensis (formerly Muscicapa noveboracensis, V. cantatrix, V. musicus, etc.), a small stout-bodied greenlet notable for the brightness of the olive parts, the richness of the yellow about the face and eyes and along the sides, and especially the white iris. It is scarcely 5 inches long and 8 in extent; it inhabits the eastern United States, west regularly to the great plains and sometimes beyond, breeds in all its United States range, and winters from the Southern States to the West Indies and Guatemala. It abounds in shrubbery and tangle, is vivacious and sprightly, has a medley of voluble notes, and hangs its nest in a low bush. Scraps of newspaper usually enter into this fabric, whence the white-eye was nicknamed "the politician" by Wilson. This is one of the longest- and best-known of its family, and was known to the earlier ornithologists as the green flycatcher (Pennant), hanging flycatcher (Latham), green wren (Bartram), etc. White-eyed vireos, like Maryland yellowthroats and summer yellowbirds, are among the most frequent foster-parents of the cowbird. Also called white-eyed greenlet.—Yellow-green vireo, V. flavoviridis, a near relative of the redeye and whip-tom-kelly, but yellower, of Mexico and over the United States border.—Yellow-throated vireo. See yellow-throated.

White-eyed Vireo (Vireo noveboracensis).

Vireonidæ (vir-ē-on'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Vireo(n-) + -idæ.] A family of small dentirostral oscine passerine birds, related to the Laniidæ or shrikes; the vireos or greenlets. They have a hooked bill, rictal bristles, ten primaries, scutellate tarsi, and toes coherent at the base. They are all small birds, under 7 inches long, of simple and mostly greenish coloration, and are confined to America, where they are migratory in the northern parts. The genera are Vireo, specially characteristic of North America, containing some 30 species in its several sections, with Laletes, Cyclarhis, Hylophilus, Vireolanius, and Neochloe, and probably Dulus and Phœnicomanes. N. brevipennis is a Mexican type; L. osburni is peculiar to Jamaica. The Vireonidæ are remarkable in possessing either ten, or apparently only nine, primaries in closely related forms, owing to the variable development of the spurious first primary, which is sometimes quite rudimentary. The species of Vireo are insectivorous, and inhabit woodland and shrubbery, have an earnest and voluble, often highly melodious song, weave pensile nests, and lay spotted eggs. See the phrase-names under Vireo, and cuts under Dulus, Hylophilus, redeye, solitary, Vireo, and whip-tom-kelly.

Vireoninæ (vir″ē-ō-nī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Vireo(n-) + -inæ.] The Vireonidæ rated as a subfamily of Laniidæ.

vireonine (vir'ē-ō-nin), a. Of or pertaining to the Vireonidæ; resembling or related to a vireo.

The usual Vireonine style of architecture . . . a closely-matted cup swung pensile from a forked twig, nearly hemispherical in contour, and rather large for the size of the bird. Coues, Birds of Colorado Valley, I. 523.

Vireosylvia (vir″ē-ō-sil'vi-ä), n. [NL. (Bonaparte, 1838), < Vireo + Sylvia, q. v.] A genus of vireos, or section of Vireo, including the larger greenlets with comparatively slender bill, as the common red-eyed vireo, the black-whiskered vireo, the whip-tom-kelly, and others. See cut under greenlet.

virescence (vī-res'ens), n. [< virescen(t) + -ce.] 1. Greenness; viridescence.—2. In bot., the abnormal assumption of a green color by organs normally bright-colored, as when the petals of a flower retain their characteristic form, but become green.

virescent (vī-res'ent), a. [< L. virescen(t-)s, ppr. of virescere, grow green, inceptive of virere, be green: see virent.] Greenish; slightly green; turning or becoming green.

viretont (vir'e-ton), n. [OF. vireton, dim. of vire, a crossbow-bolt: see vire[1], 1.] Same as vire[1], 1.

virga (vėr'gä), n.; pl. virgæ (-jē). [NL., < L. virga, a rod.] The penis.

virgal (vėr'gal), a. [< L. virga, a rod, twig, + -al.] Made of twigs.

virgaloo, n. Same as virgouleuse.

virgarius (vėr-gā'ri-us), n.; pl. virgarii (-ī). [ML., < L. virga, a rod: see verge[1], virgate[2].] A holder of a virgate or yard-land. See yard-land.

virgate[1] (vėr'gāt), a. [< L. virgatus, made of twigs, striped, resembling a rod, < virga, a rod, twig: see verge[1].] Having the shape of a wand or rod; slender, straight, and erect: as, a virgate stem; a virgate polyp.

virgate[2] (vėr'gāt), n. [< L. virga, a rod, in LL. a measure of land (like E. rod, pole, or perch): see verge[1]. Cf. virgate[1].] A measure of surface (corresponding to the ML. terra virgata, measured land). Different areas have been so called, without much uniformity. Compare quotation under holding, 3 (a).

virgated (vėr'gā-ted), a. Same as virgate[1].

virget, virgert. Old spellings of verge[1], verger[1].

Virgilia (vėr-jil'i-ä), n. [NL. (Lamarck, 1793), so called in honor of Virgil (Publius Virgilius Maro), the Roman poet, with ref. to the botanical interest of his "Georgics."] An untenable name for Andrastis, a genus of leguminous trees. It is characterized by papilionaceous rose-purple flowers with a broad banner-petal, falcate wings, and connate keel-petals, and by a sessile ovary which becomes a coriaceous, wingless, flattened two-valved pod. The only species, Andrastis Capensis (Virgilia Capensis of Lamarck), is an evergreen tree of Cape Colony, from 15 to 30 feet high, cultivated under the name Cape Virgilia; it bears pinnate leaves with small leaflets, and handsome flowers in short terminal racemes.

Virgilian (vėr-jil'i-an), a. [Also Vergilian; < L. Virgilius (prop. Vergilius) (see def.) + -an.] 1. Of or pertaining to Virgil (Publius Virgilius Maro), the greatest Roman epic poet (70–19 B. C.): as, the Virgilian poems.—2. Resembling the style of Virgil.

The young candidate for academical honours was no longer required to write Ovidian epistles or Virgilian pastorals. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., iii.

★virgin (vėr'jin), n. and a. [< ME. virgine, vergine, < OF. virgine, vernacularly vierge, F. vierge = Sp. virgen = Pg. virgem = It. vergine, < L. virgo (virgin-), a maid, virgin, girl or woman (in eccl. writers also of males), as adj. unwedded, fresh, unused; root uncertain.] I. n. 1. A woman who has had no carnal knowledge of man; a maiden of inviolate chastity; a pure maid. Gen. xxiv. 16.

Sure there is a power
In that great name of virgin that binds fast
All rude uncivil bloods, all appetites
That break their confines.
Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess, i. 1.

The decencies to which women are obliged made these virgins stifle their resentment so far as not to break into open violences. Steele, Spectator, No. 80.

2. A man who has preserved his chastity.

These are they which were not defiled with women; for they are virgins. Rev. xiv. 4.

Before the sepulcher of Christ there is masse said euerie day, and none may say the masse there but a man that is a pure virgin. E. Webbe, Travels (ed. Arber), p. 26.

The Saints are virgins;
They love the white rose of virginity; . . .
I have been myself a virgin.
Tennyson, Harold, iii. 1.

3. One who professes perpetual virginity; especially, in the early church, one of a class or order of women who were vowed to lifelong continence.—4†. The state of virginity.

St. Jerom affirms that to be continent in the state of widowhood is harder than to keep our virgin pure.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 90.

5. A parthenogenetic insect, as an aphid; a female insect which lays eggs which hatch, though there has been no fecundation for some generations by the male.—6. Any female animal which has not had young, or has not copulated.—7. [cap.] The zodiacal sign or the constellation Virgo. See Virgo.

When the bright Virgin gives the beauteous days.

It is an acrid plant; the leaves are sometimes used as a rubefacient in rheumatism.—Upright virgin's-bower, Clematis recta (C. erecta), of southern Europe, a very acrid plant acting as a diuretic and diaphoretic, sometimes applied internally, and externally for ulcers.

Virgin-worship (vėr'jin-wėr″ship), n. Adoration of the Virgin Mary. See Mariolatry.

Virgo (vėr'gō), n. [NL., < L. virgo, maiden: see virgin.] An ancient constellation and sign of the zodiac. The figure represents a winged woman in a robe holding a spike of grain in her left hand. One of the stars was called Vindemiatrix, or by the Greeks Protrygeter—that is, precursor of the vintage. At the time when the zodiac seems to have been formed, 2100 B. C., this star would first be seen at Babylon before sunrise about August 20th, or, since there is some evidence it was then brighter than it is now, perhaps a week earlier. This would seem too late for the vintage, so that perhaps this tradition is older than the zodiac. Virgo appears in the Egyptian zodiacs without wings, yet there seems no room to doubt that the figure was first meant for the winged Assyrian Astarte, especially as the sixth month in Accadian is called the "Errand of Istar." The symbol of the zodiacal sign is ♍, where a resemblance to a wing may be seen. The constellation contains the white first-magnitude star Spica. See cut in next column.

The Constellation Virgo.

virgouleuse, virgoleuse (vėr-gō-lėz'), n. [F., < Virgoulée, a village near Limoges, in France.] A kind of pear. Also called white doyenné, and by other names.

Virgularia (vėr-gū-lā'ri-ą), n. [NL. (Lamarck, 1816), < L. virgula, a little rod (see virgule), + -aria.] The typical genus of the family Virgulariidæ, having the pinnæ very short, as V. mirabilis.

Virgulariidæ (vėr″gū-lā-rī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Virgularia + -idæ.] A family of pennatulaceous alcyonarian polyps, typified by the genus Virgularia; the sea-rods. They are related to the sea-pens, but are of long, slender, virgulate form. The rachis includes a slender axial rod, and the polypites are set in transverse rows or clusters on each side of nearly the whole length of the polypidom.

Virgularia mirabilis.
a, terminal portion of polypidom (two thirds natural size), bearing the polypites; b, section (twice natural size), showing three clusters of polypites alternating on opposite sides of the rachis.

virgulate (vėr'gū-lāt), a. [< L. virgula, a little rod, + -ate[1].] Rod-shaped.

virgule (vėr'gūl), n. [< F. virgule, a comma, a little rod, < L. virgula, a little rod, dim. of virga, a rod: see verge[1].] 1. A little rod; a twig.—2. A comma. Hallam, Lit. Hist. of Europe, i. 8. [Rare.]

It is the highest of the substages recognized in the Kimmeridgian of central France.

virgultum (vėr-gul'tum), n. [NL., < L. virgultum, a bush, contr. < virguletum*, < virgula, a little twig: see virgule.] A small twig; a sprout.

virial (vir'i-al), n. [After G. virial (Clausius, 1870), < L. vis (vir-), force: see vim, vis[3].] The sum of the attractions between all the pairs of particles of a system, each multiplied by the distance between the pair.—Theorem of the virial, the proposition that when a system of particles is in stationary motion its mean kinetic energy is equal to its virial.

virid (vir'id), a. [< L. viridis, green, < virere, be green. Cf. verd, vert, verdant, etc., from the same source.] Green; verdant. Fairfax, tr. of Tasso, xii. 94. (Nares.) [Rare.]

viridescence (vir-i-des'ens), n. [< viridescen(t) + -ce.] The state or property of being viridescent or greenish.

viridescent (vir-i-des'ent), a. [< LL. viridescen(t-)s, ppr. of viridescere, be green, < L. viridis, green: see virid. Cf. virescent.] Slightly green; greenish.

viridian (vi-rid'i-an), n. [< L. viridis, green, + -an.] Same as Veronese green (which see, under green[1]).

viridigenous (vir-i-dij'e-nus), a. [< L. viridis, green, + -genus, producing: see -genous.] Producing viridity; in zoöl., specifying certain microscopic vegetable organisms which, when swallowed as food by such mollusks as the oyster and clam, impart a green tinge to the flesh.

viridine (vir'i-din), n. [< viride (see def.) + -ine[2].] A base, $C_{12}H_{19}N$, obtained from coal-tar.

viridite (vir'i-dīt), n. [< L. viridis, green, + -ite[2].] In lithol., the name given by Vogelsang to certain minute greenish-colored scaly, filamentary, or granular bodies frequently seen in microscopic sections of more or less altered rocks, especially such as contain hornblende, augite, and olivin. They are too small to have their exact nature distinctly made out, but probably generally belong to the chlorite or serpentine families.

viridity (vi-rid'i-ti), n. [< L. viridita(t-)s, greenness, verdure, < viridis, green: see virid, verd.] 1. Greenness; verdure; the state of having the color of fresh vegetation.

This deification of their trees amongst other things, besides their age and perennial viridity . . .
Evelyn, Sylva, iv. § 13.

2. In zoöl., specifically, the greenness acquired by certain mollusks after feeding on viridigenous organisms; greening, as of the oyster.

viridness (vir'id-nes), n. Greenness; viridity.

virile (vir'il or vī'ril), a. [< OF. (and F.) viril = Sp. Pg. viril = It. virile, < L. virilis, of a man, manly, < vir, a man, a hero, = Gr. ἥρως (for Fήρως), a hero (see hero), = Skt. vīra, a hero, heroic, = Zend vira, a hero, = Lith. wyra, a man, = Ir. fear = Goth. wair = OS. OHG. wer, a man (see wer[1], wergild, werwolf, etc.); root unknown. From L. vir are also ult. E. virility, virago, virtue, etc., and the second element in duumvir, triumvir, decemvir, etc.] 1. Pertaining to a man as opposed to a woman; belonging to the male sex; hence, pertaining to procreation: as, the virile power.

Little Rawdon . . . was grown almost too big for black velvet now, and was of a size and age befitting him for the assumption of the virile jacket and pantaloons.
Thackeray, Vanity Fair, xliv.

2. Masculine; not feminine or puerile; hence, masterful; strong; forceful.

Nor was his fabrique raised by soft and limber stud, but sturdy and virile.
H. L'Estrange, Reign of K. Charles (ed. 1655), p. 92.

Only the virile and heroic can fully satisfy her own nature, and master it for good or evil.
Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 407.

The men [of Greece] were essentially virile, yet not rude; the women as essentially feminine, yet not weak.
Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLI. 714.

Virile member (membrum virile), the penis. = Syn. Manly, etc. See masculine.

virilescence (vir-i-les'ens), n. [< virilescen(t) + -ce.] The state of the aged female in which she assumes some of the characteristics of the male. (Dunglison.) It is no uncommon condition of fowls which are sterile, or those which have ceased to lay.

virilescent (vir-i-les'ent), a. [< L. virilis, virile, + -escent.] Assuming some characteristics of the male, as a female: as when a hen past laying acquires a plumage like that of the cock, and tries to crow.

virilia (vī-ril'i-ą), n. pl. [L., neut. pl. of virilis, virile: see virile.] The male organs of generation.

virility (vi- or vī-ril'i-ti), n. [< F. virilité = Sp. virilidad = Pg. virilidade = It. virilità, < L. virilita(t-)s, manhood, < virilis, manly: see virile.] 1. Manhood; the state of one of the male sex who has arrived at the maturity and strength of a man, and acquired the power of procreation. — 2. The power of procreation.

We may infer, therefore, that sexual power and high sexual characters go hand in hand, and that in proportion to the advance toward organic perfection virility increases.
Amer. Nat., Nov., 1890, p. 1030.

3. Character or conduct of man, or befitting a man; masculine action or aspect; hence, strength; vigor.

Yet could they never observe and keep the virility of visage and lyonlike look of his [Alexander's].
Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 1038.

A country gentlewoman pretty much famed for this virility of behaviour in party disputes.
Addison, Freeholder, No. 26.

The result some day to be reached will be normal liberty, political vitality and vigor, civil virility.
W. Wilson, State, § 1195.

viripotent† (vī-rip'ō-tent), a. [< L. viripoten(t-)s, fit for a husband, marriageable, < vir, man, husband, + potens, able, having power: see potent.] Fit for a husband; marriageable.

Which was the cause wherefore he would not suffer his sonne to marrie hir, being not of ripe yeares nor viripotent or mariable. Holinshed, Hen. II., an. 1177.

viritoot†, n. An unexplained word found in the following passage:

What eyleth yow? Som gay gerl, God it woot,
Hath brought yow thus upon the viritoot.
Chaucer, Miller's Tale, l. 584.

[The word is variously spelled viritoot, vyritote, veritote, verytrot, merytot. Compare it with the word viritrate.] viritrate†, n. An opprobrious term, as yet not satisfactorily explained, found in the following passage:

This somonour clappeth at the wydowes gate:
"Com out," quod he, "thou olde virytrate."
Chaucer, Friar's Tale, l. 284.

[The MSS. read virytrate, viritrate, veritrate, verye crate, viritate, veritate, very trate. Tyrwhitt has the reading thou olde very trate, based upon two MSS., and regards trate as used for 'trot,' a common term for an old woman. The explanation is not satisfactory.]

virmilion†, n. and a. An old spelling of vermilion.

virolai†, n. Same as virelay.

virola-tallow (vir'ō-lä-tal'ō), n. A concrete fat from the seeds of Virola sebifera.

virole (vi-rōl'), n. [< OF. virol, virole, also virelle, viroele, F. virole, a ring, ferrule, < ML. virola, a ring, bracelet, equiv. to L. viriola, a bracelet, dim. of viria, a bracelet, armlet: see ferrule[2], which is a doublet of virole.] A circlet or little hoop of iron put round the end of a cane, a knife-handle, and the like; a ferrule; hence, in her., a hoop or ring; one of the rings surrounding a trumpet or horn. Some writers apply it especially to the funnel-shaped opening at the larger end.

viroled (vi-rōld'), a. [< virole + -ed[2].] Same as veruled.

viron†, n. [ME. viroun, also contr. vyrne, later verne, early mod. E. fearne (Cotgrave), < OF. viron, for environ, around, about, vironner, surround: see environ.] A circuit. Halliwell.

Vyrne or sercle (cerkyll, P). Girus, ambitus, circulus.
Prompt. Parv., p. 510.

vironry†, n. [< viron + -ry.] Environment.

Her streaming rayes have pierced the cloudie skies,
And made heau'ns traitors blush to see their shame;
Cleared the world of her black vironries,
And with pale feare doth all their treason tame.
C. Tourneur, Transf. Metamorphosis, st. 85.

virose (vī'rōs), a. [< L. virosus, poisonous, foul, < virus: see virus.] 1. Full of virus; virulent; poisonous: as, the virose bite of some spiders. — 2. In bot., emitting a fetid odor.

virous (vī'rus), a. [< L. virosus, poisonous: see virose.] Possessing poisonous properties; charged with virus.

virtu (vir-tō'), n. [Also vertu; = It. virtù, vertù, virtue, excellence, a love of the fine arts: see virtue.] A word used chiefly in the phrase article of virtu, an object interesting for its precious material, fine or curious workmanship, antiquity, rarity, or the like, such as gems, medals, enamels, etc.: usually an object of some quality of art which appeals to fancy or to a curious taste.

I had thoughts in my chamber to place it in view,
To be shown to my friends as a piece of virtù.
Goldsmith, Haunch of Venison.

His shop was a perfect infirmary for decayed articles of virtu from all the houses for miles around. Cracked china, lame tea-pots, broken shoe-buckles, rickety tongs, and decrepit fire-irons, all stood in melancholy proximity, awaiting Sam's happy hours of inspiration.
H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 34.

★virtual (vėr'tū-al), a. [= F. virtuel = Sp. Pg. virtual = It. virtuale, < ML. virtualis (Duns Scotus), < L. virtus, strength, virtue: see virtue.] 1. Existing in effect, power, or virtue, but not actually: opposed to real, actual, formal, immediate, literal.

Shall this distinction be called real? I answer, it is not properly real actual in the sense in which that is commonly called real actual which is a difference between things and in act, for in one person there is no difference of things on account of the divine simplicity. And as it is not real actual, so it is not real potential, for nothing is there in power which is not in act. But it can be called . . . a virtual difference, because that which has such a distinction in itself has not thing and thing, but is one thing having virtually or eminently, as it were, two realities, for to either reality, as it is in that thing, belongs the property which is in such reality as though it were a distinct thing: for so this reality distinguishes and that does not distinguish, as though this were one thing and that another.
Duns Scotus, Opus Oxoniense (trans.), I. ii. 7.

[This passage is given as affording perhaps the earliest example of the word in Latin.]

Love not the heavenly spirits, and how their love Express they? by looks only? or do they mix
Irradiance, virtual or immediate touch?
Milton, P. L., viii. 617.

But America is virtually represented. What? does the electrick force of virtual representation more easily pass over the Atlantick than pervade Wales, which lies in your immediate neighbourhood, or than Chester and Durham, surrounded by abundance of representation that is actual and palpable? Burke, Conciliation with America.

Attributes a few chapters to the virtual compiler of the whole. D. G. Mitchell, Wet Days, p. 73.

2. Pertaining to a real force or virtue; potential.

Fomented by his virtual power. Milton, P. L., xi. 339.

We have no nitre of our own virtual enough to whiten us. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 398.

The resurrection of the just is attributed to his resurrection as the virtual and immediate cause thereof.
Sir M. Hale, Knowledge of Christ Crucified.

3. In mech., as usually understood, possible and infinitesimal: but this meaning seems to have arisen from a misunderstanding of the original phrase virtual velocity, first used by John Bernoulli, January 26th, 1717, which was not clearly defined as a velocity at all, but rather as an infinitesimal displacement of the point of application of a force resolved in the direction of that force. The principle of virtual velocities is that, if a body is in equilibrium, the sum of all the forces each multiplied by the virtual velocity of its point of application is, for every possible infinitesimal displacement of the body, equal to zero. The epithet appears to have been derived from an older statement that when, by means of any machine, two weights are brought into equilibrium, the velocities are inversely as the weights; so that virtual would here mean practical, as in def. 1. — Virtual coefficient. See coefficient. — Virtual cognition (notitia virtualis), the implicit existence in the mind of a concept as part of another, without special attention to this secondary concept. The term is due to Duns Scotus. — Virtual difference. See difference. — Virtual displacement, an infinitesimal arbitrary displacement, essentially the same as a virtual velocity. — Virtual focus, in optics, a point at which the lines of a pencil of rays would meet if sufficiently produced, although the rays themselves do not actually reach it. See focus, 1. — Virtual head. See head. — Virtual image, in optics, an apparent image; an image which has no real existence. See under lens, mirror. — Virtual moment of a force. See moment. — Virtual monopoly. See monopoly. — Virtual quantity. Same as intensive quantity (which see, under intensive). — Virtual resistance. See resistance, 3. — Virtual velocity. See def. 3.

virtuality (vėr-tū-al'i-ti), n. [= It. virtualità; as virtual + -ity.] 1. The state or quality of being virtual or not actual. — 2†. Potentiality; potential existence.

In one grain of corn . . . there lieth dormant the virtuality of many other, and from thence sometimes proceed above an hundred ears. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vii. 2.

virtually (vėr'tū-al-i), adv. In a virtual manner; in principle, or in effect, if not in actuality.

They virtually deprived the church of every power and privilege which, as a simple society, she had a claim to.

Weight, mobility, inertia, cohesion are universally recognized — are virtually, if not scientifically, understood to be essential attributes of matter.
H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 507.

Though it was obvious that the war north of the Alps was virtually over, yet Prussia was still pouring troops into Austrian territory.
E. Dicey, Victor Emmanuel, p. 292.

virtuate† (vėr'tū-āt), v. t. [< virtue + -ate[2].] To make efficacious.

Potable gold should be endued with a capacity of being assimilated to the innate heat and radical moisture, or at least virtuated with a power of generating the said essentials. Harvey.

virtue (vėr'tū), n. [Early mod. E. also vertue; < ME. vertu (pl. vertues, vertus, vertuz, vertous, vertuis), < OF. vertu, F. vertu = Sp. virtud = Pg. virtude = It. vertù, virtù, < L. virtus (virtut-), the qualities of a man, strength, courage, bravery, capacity, worth, manliness, applied to physical and intellectual excellence; also of moral excellence, virtue, morality; < vir, man: see virile.] 1†. Manly spirit; bravery; valor; daring; courage.

And so much vertu was in Leodogan and his men that thei made hem remove and forsake place.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 335.

Pindar many times prayseth highly victories of small moment, matters rather of sport than vertue.
Sir P. Sidney, Apol. for Poetrie.

You are brave captains.
Most valiant men; go up yourselves; use virtue;
See what will come on't. Fletcher, Bonduca, v. 2.

2. Moral goodness; the practice of moral duties and the conformity of life and conversation to the moral law; uprightness; rectitude; morality: the opposite of vice.

In euerie degree and sort of men vertue is commendable, but not egally: not onely because mens estates are vnegall, but for that also vertue it selfe is not in euery respect of egall value and estimation.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 34.

He daub'd his vice with show of virtue.
Shak., Rich. III., iii. 5. 29.

If Virtue be to itself no small Reward, and Vice in a great measure its own Punishment, we have a solid ground to go upon. Shaftesbury, Moralists, ii. § 3.

To do good for its own sake is virtue, to do it for some ulterior end or object, not itself good, is never virtue; and never to act but for the sake of an end, other than doing well and right, is the mark of vice.
F. H. Bradley, Ethical Studies, p. 56.

Hutcheson, who is the very founder in modern times of the doctrine of "a moral sense," and who has defended the disinterested character of virtue more powerfully than perhaps any other moralist, resolved all virtue into benevolence, or the pursuit of the happiness of others; but he maintained that the excellence and obligation of benevolence are revealed to us by "a moral sense."
Lecky, Europ. Morals, I. 4.

3. A particular moral excellence: as, the virtue of temperance or of charity.

For, if our virtues
Did not go forth of us, 'twere all alike
As if we had them not. Shak., M. for M., i. 1. 34.

Being a Prince so full of Virtues, . . . he [the Black Prince] left no Place for any Vice.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 127.

The virtues of a private Christian are patience, obedience, submission, and the like; but those of a magistrate, or general, or a king, are prudence, counsel, active fortitude, coercive power, awful command, and the exercise of magnanimity as well as justice.
Dryden, Orig. and Prog. of Satire.

Great faults, therefore, may grow out of great virtues in excess. De Quincey, Style, i.

4. Specifically, female purity; chastity.

Angelo had never the purpose to corrupt her; only he hath made an essay of her virtue.
Shak., M. for M., iii. 1. 164.

Hast. I believe the girl has virtue.
Mar. And if she has, I should be the last man in the world that would attempt to corrupt it.
Goldsmith, She Stoops to Conquer, iv.

5. Any good quality, merit, or admirable faculty.

The times which followed the Restoration peculiarly require that unsparing impartiality which is his [Hallam's] most distinguishing virtue.
Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

The virtue of books is to be readable, and of orators to be interesting. Emerson, Eloquence.

6. An inherent power; a property capable of producing certain effects; strength; force; potency; efficacy; influence, especially active influence, and often medicinal efficacy.

Zif zou lyke to knowe the Vertues of the Dyamand (as men may fynde in the Lipidarye, that many men knowen noght), I schalle telle zou. Mandeville, Travels, p. 159.

This Salomon was wise and knew the vertues of stones and trees, and so hee knew the course of the starres.
Sir T. Malory, Morte d'Arthur, III. lxxxvi.

I see there 's virtue in my heavenly words.
Marlowe, Faustus, i. 3.

Jesus, immediately knowing that virtue had gone out of him, turned him about in the press, and said, Who touched my clothes? Mark v. 30.

Your If is the only peace-maker; much virtue in If.
Shak., As you Like it, v. 4. 108.

These I can cure, such secret virtue lies
In herbs applied by a virgin's hand.
Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess, i. 1.

7. One of the orders of the celestial hierarchy. The virtues are often represented in art as angels in complete armor, bearing pennons and battle-axes.

Hear, all ye angels, progeny of light,
Thrones, dominations, princedoms, virtues, powers!
Hear my decree. Milton, P. L., v. 601.

8†. A mighty work; a miracle.

Chalmers, Constitution of Man, ii. (Encyc. Dict.) virtueless (vėr'tū-les), a. [< virtue + -less.] Destitute of virtue, potency, or efficacy; worthless.

And these digressive things
Are such as you may well endure, since (being deriv'd from kings,
And kings not poor nor virtueless) you cannot hold me base,
Nor scorn my words, which oft, though true, in mean men meet disgrace. Chapman, Iliad, xiv. 107.

Virtueless she wish'd all herbs and charms,
Wherewith false men increase their patients' harms.
Fairfax.

On the right hand of one of the marines of Salvator, in the Pitti palace, there is a passage of sea reflecting the sunrise, which is thoroughly good, and very like Turner; the rest of the picture, as the one opposite to it, utterly virtueless. Ruskin, Mod. Painters, II. v. 1.

The Academy, April 13, 1889, p. 261.

virtuosity (vir-tō-os'i-ti), n. [< virtuoso + -ity.] 1. Lovers of the elegant arts collectively; the virtuosi.

It was Zum Grünen Ganse, . . . where all the Virtuosity and nearly all the Intellect of the place assembled of an evening. Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, i. 3.

2. In the fine arts, exceptional skill; highly cultivated dexterity; thorough control of technic. Virtuosity is really a condition to the highest artistic success, since it means a complete mastery of the materials and processes at the artist's disposal; but, inasmuch as the ready use of materials and processes is often in itself wonderful to the percipient, virtuosity is often erroneously cultivated and applauded for its own sake. The term is especially applied to music.

In this [inlaid work], as in the later work of most styles of art, mechanical virtuosity . . . was beginning to usurp the place of originality and purity of design.
G. C. M. Birdwood, Indian Arts, II. 44.

This gave to both performers a legitimate opportunity of displaying their virtuosity.
The Academy, June 15, 1889, p. 420.

Brilliancy of technique is now the property of nearly every public performer, and instrumental music is being threatened by that decadence which all art history proves is the constant companion of virtuosity.
The Century, XXXV. 2.

virtuoso (vir-tō-ō'sō), n.; pl. virtuosos, virtuosi (-sōz, -si). [= F. virtuose, < It. virtuoso, a virtuoso, lit. one who is excellent, i. e. excels in taste; see virtuous.] 1†. An experimental philosopher; a student of things by direct observation. Boyle.—2. One who has an instructed appreciation of artistic excellence; a person skilled in or having a critical taste for any of the elegant arts, as painting, sculpture, etc.; one having special knowledge or skill in antiquities, curiosities, and the like.

The Italians call a man a virtuoso who loves the noble arts and is a critic in them.
Dryden, On Dufresnoy's Art of Painting.

Our host . . . had been a Colonel in France; . . . was a true old blade, and had been a very curious virtuoso, as we found by a handsome collection of books, medals, . . . and other antiquities. Evelyn, Diary, March 23, 1646.

Nothing can be pleasanter than to see a circle of these virtuosos about a cabinet of medals, descanting upon the value, rarity, and authenticalness of the several pieces that lie before them. Addison, Ancient Medals, i.

If this virtuoso excels in one thing more than another, it is in canes. Steele, Tatler, No. 142.

His house, indeed, would not much attract the admiration of the virtuoso. He built it himself, and it is remarkable only for its plainness. Fielding, Amelia, iii. 12.

3. One who is a master of the mechanical part of a fine art, especially music, and who makes display of his dexterity. See virtuosity, 2.

3. Being in conformity to the moral or divine law: as, a virtuous deed; a virtuous life.

If what we call virtue be only virtuous because it is useful, it can only be virtuous when it is useful.
Lecky, Europ. Morals, I. 45.

The beauty of a virtuous action may be explained as consisting in its relation to the virtuous character in which it has its source, or to the other acts of a virtuous life, or to the general condition of a virtuous state of society.
Fowler, Shaftesbury and Hutcheson, p. 67.

If there is any virtuous action performed at any time, that in it which constitutes it virtuous is the motive of universal love which is its impelling force.
Bibliotheca Sacra, XLVII. 570.

4. Chaste; pure; modest.

Mistress Ford, . . . the modest wife, the virtuous creature, that hath the jealous fool to her husband.
Shak., M. W. of W., iv. 2. 136.

Her beauty was beyond compare,
She was both virtuous and fair.
The Suffolk Miracle (Child's Ballads, I. 218).

5†. Efficacious by inherent qualities; having singular or eminent properties or powers; potent; effective.

Ther nas no man nowhere so vertuous;
He was the beste beggere in his hous.

pampas, and playing there the same part in the fauna that is taken in North America by the prairie-dogs and other spermophiles. It is of stout form, and about 2 feet long; the colors are varied, especially on the face, giving a harlequin visage. Its burrows are so numerous as to constitute a danger to travel, especially at night, the holes being so deep that a horse is almost certain to fall if he steps in one.—Alpine viscacha, Lagidium cuvieri. See Lagidium, and cut under rabbit-squirrel.

viscachera (vis-kä-chā′rä), n. [Amer. Sp., < viscacha, q. v.] A village or settlement of viscachas, resembling a prairie-dog town.

Viscæ (vis′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1880), < Viscum + -eæ.] A tribe of apetalous plants, of the family Loranthaceæ. It includes 13 genera, of which Viscum, the mistletoe, is the type; two of the others, Razoumofskya and Phoradendron, include the American mistletoes. It is practically equivalent to the subfamily Viscoideæ of Engler, of which his tribe Viscæ includes only the genus Viscum and one other.

viscera, n. Plural of viscus.

viscerad (vis′e-rad), adv. [< viscera + *-ad*³.] Toward the viscera; hemad; ventrad.

visceral (vis′e-ral), a. [= F. viscéral; as viscera + -al.] 1. Of or pertaining to the viscera; having the character of a viscus; forming or containing viscera; interior or intestinal, as a part or organ of the body; splanchnic: as, visceral anatomy; a visceral cavity; visceral disease; the visceral loop of the nerves of a mollusk; the visceral as distinguished from the reflected or parietal layer of a serous membrane.

Love is of all other the inmost and most visceral affection; and therefore called by the apostle "Bowels of Love." Bp. Reynolds, The Passions, xi.

To begin with, every sensation of the skin and every visceral sensation seems to derive from its topographic seat a peculiar shade of feeling, which it would not have in another place. W. James, Prin. of Psychol., II. 155.

2. Belonging to or situated on that side of the body of a vertebrate which contains the viscera of the thorax; abdominal; ventral or hemal, as distinguished from dorsal or neural.—Visceral anatomy. Same as splanchnotomy.—Visceral arches, certain folds or thickenings of the walls of the embryo in the region of the neck, extending transversely, and ultimately uniting in front in the middle line;

Chick Embryo at the end of third day of incubation. a, dorsal aorta; a′, first or mandibular aortic arch; *a*³, third aortic arch, in the first branchial arch; ac, carotid artery; av, vitelline artery; bf, thalamencephalon or fore-brain; bh, medulla oblongata; bl, cerebellum; bm, mid-brain; bs, cerebral hemisphere; ci, auditory vesicle; hc′, first visceral or branchial cleft; *hc*², second visceral or branchial cleft; hm, hyomandibular cleft; ms, mesoblastic somite or protovertebra; ns, spinal cord; oc, optic cup; of, olfactory pit; ol, lens; pn, pineal body; ra, auricle of heart; rt, truncus arteriosus; rv, ventricle of heart; vv, vitelline veins.

branchial, hyoidean, mandibular, and maxillary arches, the last three persistent and modified into hyoidean, mandibular, and maxillary parts, the first persistent only in branchiate vertebrates, where they become the gill-arches. Only a small part of the first branchial arch persists in higher vertebrates. In man it is found in the greater cornu of the hyoid bone. See thyrohyoid, and cuts under cerebral and frontonasal.—Visceral aura, premonitory symptoms of an epileptic attack, consisting in sensations of various kinds referred to the abdominal region.—Visceral cavity, that cavity of the body which contains the viscera; the subvertebral or splanchnic cavity; the body-cavity, formed by the splitting of the mesoblast between the somatopleure and the splanchnopleure; the cœloma.—Visceral clefts, pharyngeal slits (see pharyngeal). See slit, n., 5.—Visceral crisis, violent spasmodic pain in one of the abdominal organs, occurring in locomotor ataxia.—Visceral hump, visceral dome, in mollusks, the heap of viscera which makes a prominence of the dorsal region; the cupola.—Visceral inversion. Same as transposition of the viscera. See transposition.—Visceral laminæ. See lamina.—Visceral loop, in mollusks, the loop, twist, or turn of the viscera or of their nerves. See cut under Pulmonata.—Visceral nervous system, the subvertebral or sympathetic system of nerves.—Visceral pleura. See *pleura*¹.—Visceral skeleton, the skeleton of the visceral arches.—Visceral slit. Same as visceral cleft.—Visceral tube, the visceral cavity, especially when tubular, or, in an early state of the embryo, when it is comparable to the neural tube that contains the spinal cord.

visceralgia (vis-e-ral′ji-ä), n. [< NL. viscera + Gr. ἄλγος, pain.] Neuralgia of one of the abdominal viscera, especially the intestine; enteralgia.

viscerate (vis′e-rāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. viscerated, ppr. viscerating. [< viscera + *-ate*².] Cf. L. visceratio(n-), a public distribution of flesh or meat.] To eviscerate or disembowel.

viscericardiac (vis″e-ri-kär′di-ak), a. [< viscericardium + -ac.] Of or pertaining to the viscericardium; sciscripericardial.

viscericardium (vis″e-ri-kär′di-um), n.; pl. viscericardia (-ä). [NL., < L. viscera, viscera, + Gr. καρδία, heart.] The visceripericardial sac, or peculiar pericardium of a cephalopod.

viscerimotor (vis′e-ri-mō″tor), a. [< L. viscera, viscera, + LL. motor, mover.] Innervating viscera, as a motor nerve; conveying motor influence to any viscus, as either a cerebrospinal or a sympathetic nerve. Also visceromotor.

visceripericardial (vis″ẹ-ri-per-i-kär′di-ạl), a. [< L. viscera, viscera, + pericardium, pericardium.] Common to the pericardium and other viscera: as, the peculiar visceripericardial sac of cephalopods. Also visceropericardial. E. R. Lankester.

visceromotor (vis′ẹ-rō-mō″tọr), a. Same as viscerimotor.

Viscero-motor nerves: seen to arise from both sympathetic and lumbo-sacral plexus for distribution to the pelvic viscera.
Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 108.

visceropericardial (vis″ẹ-rō-per-i-kär′di-ạl), a. Same as visceripericardial.

The viscero-pericardial sac of the Dibranchs is very large also, and extends into the dorsal region.
Encyc. Brit., XVI. 677.

visceropleural (vis″ẹ-rō-plō′rạl), a. [< L. viscera, viscera, + NL. pleura.] Same as pleurovisceral.

visceroskeletal (vis″ẹ-rō-skel′e-tạl), a. [< L. viscera, viscera, + NL. skeleton.] Pertaining to the visceral skeleton, or, more generally, to the framework of the body on the visceral side; hypaxial or subvertebral, as a part of the skeleton; splanchnoskeletal.

viscid (vis′id), a. [< LL. viscidus, clammy, sticky, < L. viscum, bird-lime, anything sticky: see viscum.] Sticky; having a sticky or glutinous consistency; produced by or covered by a tenacious coating or secretion. Blount, 1670.

viscidity (vi-sid′i-ti), n. [= F. viscidité; as viscid + -ity.] 1. The state or quality of being viscid; glutinousness; tenacity; stickiness. Arbuthnot, Aliments, i.—2. A glutinous concretion. [Rare.]

Catharticks of mercurials precipitate the viscidities by their stypticity. Floyer. (Johnson.) viscin (vis′in), n. [< L. viscum, bird-lime, + -in[2].] A sticky substance, one of the components of bird-lime, derived from mistletoe.

viscometer (vis-kom′e-tėr), n. [< L. viscum, bird-lime, + Gr. μέτρον, measure.] Same as viscosimeter.

viscometry (vis-kom′e-tri), n. [As viscometer + -y[3].] The measurement of the viscosity of liquids.

viscosimeter (vis-kō-sim′e-tėr), n. [Irreg. < LL. viscosus, viscous, + Gr. μέτρον, measure.] An apparatus for measuring the viscosity of various liquids, as oils. Also viscometer.

viscosimetric (vis″kō-si-met′rik), a. Of or pertaining to a viscosimeter.

viscosimetrical (vis″kō-si-met′ri-kạl), a. Same as viscosimetric.

viscosity (vis-kos′i-ti), n.; pl. viscosities (-tiz). [< F. viscosité = Sp. viscosidad = Pg. viscosidade = It. viscosità, < LL. as if viscosita(t-)s*, < viscosus, viscous: see viscous.] 1. The state or property of being viscous; the quality of flowing slowly, as pitch or castor-oil. Such liquids are commonly sticky, but this is no part of the viscosity.

Sub. And what 's your mercury?
Face. A very fugitive; he will be gone, sir.
Sub. How know you him?
Face. By his viscosity,
His oleosity, and his suscitability.
B. Jonson, Alchemist, ii. 1.

2. In physics, internal friction, a resistance to the motion of the molecules of a fluid body among themselves: opposed to mobility. Thus, the viscosity of such liquids as pitch and syrup is very great as compared with that of a mobile liquid like alcohol. A slow continuous change of the shape of solids or semisolids under the action of gravity or external force is also, by extension of the name, called viscosity: as, the viscosity of ice. Viscosity is proportional to the relative velocity of strata at a unit distance. The viscosity of gases and vapors is due to the molecules shooting from one stratum to another carrying their vis viva with them. The viscosity of liquids arises from an entirely different cause, namely, from the mutual attractions of the molecules, and is diminished by the effect of the wandering of the molecules. Consequently, the viscosity of gases increases while that of liquids diminishes as the temperature is raised.

Hence, if we attempt to cause one stratum of gas to pass over another in parallel planes, we experience a resistance due to the interchange of molecules between the portions of gas separated by the plane. This is in some respects analogous to sliding friction between solid bodies, and is called by German writers the "friction" (Reibung), by Maxwell and others the "viscosity" of the gas.
Encyc. Brit., XVI. 619.

The viscosity of liquids presents a certain analogy with the malleability of solids.
W. A. Miller, Elem. of Chem., § 45.

3. A glutinous or viscous body.

Drops of syrups, oil, and seminal viscosities.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 4.

Dynamical coefficient of viscosity, kinetic coefficient of viscosity, also dynamic viscosity. See coefficient.—Magnetic viscosity, that property of a magnetic medium which causes changes of magnetization to lag behind the change of effective magnetomotive force.

viscount (vī′kount), n. [Formerly vicount (the s being a later insertion in imitation of the F.); < ME. vicounte, viconte, < OF. viconte, visconte, F. vicomte, < ML. vicecomes (-comit-), < L. vice, in place of (see vice-), + comes, a companion: see count[2].] 1. Formerly, an officer who acted as deputy of a count or earl in the management of the affairs of the county; the sheriff of a county.

Vicount, alias Viscount (vice-comes) cometh of the French, . . . and signifieth with us as much as sheriffe. Betweene which two words I find no difference, but that the one cometh from our conquerours the Normans, and the other from our anncestors the Saxons. Cowell, 1637.

2. A degree or title of nobility next in rank below that of earl, and immediately above that of baron. It is the most recently established English title, having been first conferred by letters patent on John, sixth Baron Beaumont, by Henry VI., in 1440. In Great Britain the title is frequently attached to an earldom as a second title, and is by courtesy held by the eldest son during the lifetime of the father. The coronet of a viscount of England is composed of a circle of gold, chased, having on the edge twelve, fourteen, or sixteen pearls; the cap is of crimson velvet, turned up with ermine, and closed at the top with a rich tassel of gold. See cut under coronet.

A viscounts Eldest sonn is no Lord, nor no other of his sonns, nor none of his daughter[s] ladyes.
Booke of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), i. 28.

viscountcy (vī′kount-si), n. [< viscount + -cy.] The rank or dignity of a viscount.

The Barony of Dacre (not Dacres) and the Viscountcy of Howard of Morpeth were conferred by Oliver Cromwell on Charles Howard. N. and Q., 7th ser., V. 446.

viscountess (vī′koun-tes), n. [< OF. vicomtesse; as viscount + -ess.] 1. A peeress in rank next after a countess and before a baroness. The title is usually held by the wife of a viscount, but in Great Britain it may be inherited by a woman in her own right.

2. A size of slate. See the quotation.

Viscountesses (18 × 9). Encyc. Brit., XXII. 128.

viscountship (vī′kount-ship), n. [< viscount + -ship.] The rank or dignity of a viscount.

viscounty (vī′koun-ti), n.; pl. viscounties (-tiz). [< F. vicomté, < ML. vicecomitatus, < vicecomes, viscount: see viscount.] Same as viscountship.

The house of lords, for so the baronage may be now called, underwent under the Lancastrian kings none but personal changes, and such formal modifications as the institution of marquessates and viscounties.
Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 368.

viscous (vis′kus), a. [= F. visqueux = Sp. Pg. It. viscoso, < LL. viscosus, sticky, < L. viscum, viscus, bird-lime: see viscum.] 1. Glutinous; clammy; sticky; adhesive; tenacious.

In some [men] it is nature to be somewhat viscous and inwrapped, and not easy to turn.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

My honeysuckles . . . being enveloped in a viscous substance, and loaded with black aphides.
Gilbert White, Nat. Hist. Selborne, To D. Barrington, lxiv.

2. In physics, having the property of viscosity. See viscosity, 2.

When the very smallest stress, if continued long enough, will cause a constantly increasing change of form, the body must be regarded as a viscous fluid, however hard it may be. Clerk Maxwell, Heat, p. 276.

Glacier ice, however hard and brittle it may appear, is really a viscous substance, resembling treacle, or honey, or tar, or lava. Tyndall, Forms of Water, p. 155.

Viscous fermentation. See fermentation, 2.

viscousness (vis′kus-nes), n. The state of being viscous; viscosity.

Viscum (vis′kum), n. [< L. viscum, rarely viscus, mistletoe, bird-lime, = Gr. ἰξός (Ἰξός), mistletoe.] 1. A genus of parasitic plants, including the mistletoe, type of the tribe Visceæ in the family Loranthaceæ. It is characterized by flowers usually clustered at the axils or summits of branches, and by anthers which are broad and adnate, opening by many pores on the inner face. There are about 60 species, widely dispersed throughout warm and temperate regions of the old world. They are shrubs with opposite or dichotomous branches, parasitic on trees. The leaves are conspicuous, opposite, flat, and thickish, or are reduced to scales or minute teeth. The flowers are small, usually three to five together, sessile, and surrounded by two to three small bracts. Some of the species are distributed over a very wide area, especially V. orientale and V. album, the latter the well-known mistletoe.

2. [l. c.] Bird-lime.

viscus (vis′kus), n.; pl. viscera (vis′ẹ-rạ). [NL., < L. viscus, pl. viscera, any internal organ of the body.] Any one of the interior organs of the body, contained in one of the four great cavities of the head, thorax, abdomen, and pelvis, as the brain, heart, lung, liver, stomach, intestine, kidney, bladder, womb, etc.; especially, an abdominal viscus, as the intestine: in ordinary language generally in the plural, meaning the bowels or entrails; the vitals.

Thoracic viscera, with some of the abdominal viscera, showing line of the diaphragm which separates them, and outline of heart, aorta, and superior caval vein, with reference to the surface of the thorax; 1–10, first to tenth ribs; A, M, P, T, indicate position of aortic, mitral, pulmonary, and tricuspid valves of the heart, respectively.

Mental states occasion also changes in the calibre of blood-vessels, or alteration in the heart-beats, or processes more subtle still, in glands and viscera.
W. James, Prin. of Psychol., I. 5.

Thoracic viscera. See thoracic.—Transposition of the viscera. See transposition.

vise[1], vice[2] (vis), n. [< ME. vyse, vyce, vis, < OF. vis, viz, a screw, vise, winding stair, = It. vite, a vine, vise, < L. vitis, vine, bryony, lit. 'that which winds,' < √ vi, wind: see with[2], withy.] 1†. A screw.

His desk with a vice turning in it.
Coryat, Crudities, I. 164.

2†. The newel, or central shaft, of a winding staircase.

I ris and walkt, sought pace and pace,
Till I a winding staire found
And held the vice aye in my hond.
The Isle of Ladies, l. 1312.

The Standard, which was of mason work, costly made with images and angels, costly gilt with gold and azure, with other colours, and divers sorts of [coats of] arms costly set out, shall there continue and remain; and within the Standard a vice with a chime.
Coronation of Queen Anne, Wife of Henry VIII., in [Arber's Eng. Garner, II. 49.

3. A gripping or holding tool or appliance, fixed or portable, used to hold an object firmly in position while work is performed upon it. The vise is closely allied to the clamp; both have movable jaws that may be brought together to hold any object placed in position between the jaws. Vises are made in two parts, a, hand-vise; b, machinists' bench-vise; c, parallel vise; c′, parallel vise, with small anvil a″ in combination; e, blacksmiths' vise; f, carpenters' vise; g, pipe-vise; h, saw-filers' vise.

Vises.

forming jaws either joined together by a spring or a hinge-joint or arranged to move upon slides or guides. The jaws are moved by screws, levers, toggles, or ratchet and pawls, one jaw being usually fixed firmly to the bench or other support to which the vise is attached. Some forms are made adjustable at any angle; others have parallel motions, and are provided with swivels to adjust the jaws to the shape of the objects to be held in them. Vises are made of wood or metal, of many shapes, and supplied with many convenient attachments. They receive various names, descriptive of their use or method of construction, as bench-vise, saw-vise, sudden-grasp vise, parallel vise, pipe-vise.

4. A tool for drawing rods of lead into the grooved rods called cames used for setting glass, especially in stained-glass windows.—5†. A grip or grasp.

An I but fist him once; an a' come but within my vice.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., ii. 1. 24.

6. The cock or tap of a vessel. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

vise[1], vice[2] (vīs), v. t. [< vise[1], n.] 1†. To screw; force, as by a screw.

He swears . . .
As he had seen 't or been an instrument
To vice you to 't. Shak., W. T., i. 2. 416.

2. To press or squeeze with a vise, or as if with a vise; hold as if in a vise. De Quincey.

vise[2]†, n. Same as vese.

visé (vē-zā'), n. [< F. visé, pp. of viser, view, examine, inspect, < ML. visare*, freq. of L. videre, pp. visus, see: see vision.] An indorsement made upon a passport or the like by the properly constituted authority, whether ambassador, consul, or police, denoting that it has been examined and found correct. Also visa.

Particular rules follow in regard to visé of the commander giving the notice, which is to be put on the ship's register, and for which the captain of the vessel overhauled and visited shall give a receipt.
Woolsey, Introd. to Inter. Law, p. 463, App. iii.

The European door is closed, and remains closed until the native authorities may think proper to affix to the passport other visas and stamps, at sight of which frontier gendarmes will open the bars and set the captive free.
Harper's Mag., LXXIX. 188.

visé (vē-zā'), v. t. [< visé, n.] To put a visé on; examine and indorse, as a passport. Also visa.

Before he and his baggage can pass the guarded door that leads into the restaurant . . . he must satisfy the suave inspector that his passport is duly visaed.
Harper's Mag., LXXIX. 188.

vise-bench (vīs'bench), n. In carp., etc., a work-bench to which a vise is attached.

vise-cap (vīs'kap), n. A cap of metal or leather placed over the jaws of a vise to prevent injury of the surface of the work by its teeth.

vise-clamp (vīs'klamp), n. 1. A supplemental vise-jaw of such form as to hold work of unusual shape or material without injury.—2. A clamp by which a vise can be temporarily secured to a bench or other object.

viseman, viceman (vīs'man), n.; pl. visemen, vicemen (-men). A man who works at a vise.

vise-press (vīs'pres), n. A former name in Great Britain for the screw-press.

viser†, visere†, visern†, n. Old forms of vizor.

Vishnu (vish'nö), n. [< Skt. Vishnu.] In later Hind. myth., the god who with the other two great gods, Brahma and Siva, forms the trimurti, or trinity; the Preserver, considered by his worshipers to be the supreme god of the Hindu pantheon. In the Vedas he appears only as a manifestation of the sun. The myths relating to Vishnu are chiefly characterized by the idea that whenever a great disorder affected the world Vishnu descended to set it right. Such descents are called avatāras or avatars, and consist in Vishnu's assuming the form of some wonderful animal or superhuman being, or as being born in human form of human parents, and always endowed with miraculous power. These avatars are generally given as ten, nine of which are already past, the tenth, the Kalki-avatāra, being yet to come, "when the practices taught by the Vedas and the institutes of the law shall have ceased, and the close of the Kali or present age shall be nigh." Vishnu is sometimes represented as riding on Garuda, a being half bird and half man; as holding in one of his four hands a conch-shell blown in battle, in another a disk as emblem of supreme power, in the third a mace as the emblem of punishment, and in the fourth a lotus as a type of creative power.

visibility (viz-i-bil'i-ti), n. [< F. visibilité = Sp. visibilidad = Pg. visibilidade = It. visibilità, < LL. visibilita(t-)s, the property or condition of being seen, < visibilis, visible: see visible.] 1. The state or property of being visible, or perceivable by the eye; perceptibility; the state of being exposed to view; conspicuousness.

Sir Richard Browne [during nineteen years' exile] . . . kept up in his chapel the liturgy and offices of the Church of England, to his no small honour, and in a time when it was so low, and as many thought utterly lost, that in various controversies, both with Papists and Sectaries, our divines us'd to argue for the visibility of the Church from his chapel and congregation. Evelyn, Diary, June 4, 1660.

2†. A thing which is visible.

The visibility [of the Holy Ghost] being on an effulgency of visible light. Quoted in Walton's Complete Angler, p. 28.

visible (viz'i-bl), a. and n. [< ME. visible, < OF. (and F.) visible = Sp. visible = Pg. visivel = It. visibile, < LL. visibilis, that may be seen, < L. videre, pp. visus, see: see vision.] I. a. 1. Perceivable by the eye; capable of being seen; open to sight.

Then the eighteth sone borne of Melusin,
Thre eyes hauyng on in front visible;
Moche peple meruellyd and wonderd ther-in.
Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 1269.

Were armies to be raised whenever a speck of war is visible in our horizon, we never should have been without them. Jefferson, Works, VIII. 69.

2. Apparent; open; conspicuous: as, a man with no visible means of support.

Though his actions were not visible.
Shak., Cymbeline, iii. 4. 152.

The factions at court were greater, or more visible, than before. Clarendon.

3. In entom., noting parts which are not concealed by other parts, as the spiracles when they are not concealed under the hard parts of the integument: opposed to covered.—Visible church, in theol., the church of Christ on the earth; the whole body of professed believers in Christ.—Visible horizon, the line that bounds the sight. See horizon.—Visible means, means or resources which are apparent or ascertainable by others, so that the court or a creditor can ascertain that the person is responsible or reach his property.—Visible spectrum. See spectrum, 3.—Visible speech, a name applied by Prof. A. Melville Bell, its inventor, to a system of alphabetical characters designed to represent every possible articulate utterance of the organs of speech. The system is based on a penetrating analysis of the possible actions of the speech-organs, each organ and every mode of action having its appropriate symbol.=Syn. Discernible, in sight, obvious, manifest, clear, distinct, evident, plain, patent, unmistakable.

II. n. That which is seen by the eye.

Visibles work upon a looking-glass, which is like the pupil of the eye. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 263.

Go into thy room and enter into that spiritual communion which is beyond all visibles.
A. E. Barr, Friend Olivia, iii.

visibleness (viz'i-bl-nes), n. The state or property of being visible; visibility.

visibly (viz'i-bli), adv. In a visible manner; perceptibly to the eye; manifestly; obviously; clearly.

visie, vizie (viz'i), n. [Also vizy; < F. visée, aim, < viser, aim, sight at: see visé.] 1. A scrutinizing view or look.

Ye had best take a visie of him through the wicket before opening the gate. Scott.

2. The aim taken at an object, as when one is about to shoot.

Logan took a vizy and fired, but his gun flashed in the pan. Galt, Steam-Boat, p. 143. (Jamieson.)

3. The knob or sight on the muzzle of a gun by which aim is taken. [Scotch in all uses.]

visiert, n. See vizir.

Visigoth (viz'i-goth), n. [< LL. Visigothi*, Visegothæ, West Goths, < visi-, vise-, repr. Teut. west, + Gothi, Gothæ, Goths.] An individual of the more westerly of the two great historical divisions of the Goths. See Goth. The Visigoths founded a monarchy which continued in southern France until 507 and in Spain until 711. Also called West Goth.

Visigothic (viz-i-goth'ik), a. [< Visigoth + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Visigoths.

vision (vizh'ọn), n. [< ME. vision, visioun, visiun, < OF. vision, F. vision = Sp. visión = Pg. visão = It. visione, < L. visio(n-), the act or sense of seeing, vision, < videre, pp. visus, see, = Gr. ἰδεῖν (Fιδεῖν*), Skt. √ vid, know, = E. wit: see wit[1]. From the L. videre are also ult. E. visible, visage, vis[1], visit, visive, visual, advice, advise, device, devise, pervise, revise, supervise, provide, provision, revision, supervision, etc., evident, provident, evidence, providence, etc., purvey, survey, etc., invidious, envy[1], etc.] 1. The act of seeing external objects; sight.

Faith here is turned into vision there.
Hammond, Practical Catechism, i. § 3.

2. The faculty that perceives the luminosity, color, form, position, size, etc., of objects; that sense whose organ is the eye; by extension, an analogous mental power. As noting one of the five special senses of the body, vision is correlated with olfaction, audition, gustation, and taction. See sight[1].—3. Hodgson, Time and Space, § 12.

2. Visible; perceptible by the sight.

Among many remarkable particulars that attended his first perceptions and judgments on visual objects, . . . the first time the boy saw a black object, it gave him great uneasiness. Burke, Sublime and Beautiful, § 115.

3. Resulting from the eye; produced by a look: as, visual influences.—Primary visual centers, the lateral corpus geniculatum; the pulvinar and the anterior corpus quadrigeminum, in cells of which the fibers of the optic tract originate.—Visual angle, the angle formed by the intersection of two lines drawn from the extremities of an object to the first nodal point of the eye.—Visual axis. See axis[1].—Visual field, the extent of external world which is visible in any position of an eye.—Visual line. Same as visual axis.—Visual plane, the plane including the visual lines of the two eyes.—Visual point, in persp., a point in the horizontal line in which all the visual rays unite.—Visual purple, a pigment found in the retina: same as rhodopsin.—Visual rays, lines of light imagined to come from the object to the eye.—Visual white, the final product of the photochemical changes undergone by visual purple when exposed to the action of light.—Visual yellow, an intermediate stage of the passage of visual purple to visual white under the action of light.

visualisation, visualise, etc. See visualization, etc.

visuality (viz-ū-al′i-ti), n.; pl. visualities (-tiz). [< LL. visualita(t-)s, the faculty of sight, < visualis, of the sight: see visual.] 1. The state or property of being visual.—2. A sight; a glimpse; a mental picture.

We have a pleasant visuality of an old summer afternoon in the Queen's Court two hundred years ago.
Carlyle, Cromwell, i. 98.

visualization (viz″ū-al-i-zā′shọn), n. [< visualize + -ation.] The act, process, or result of visualizing; the state of being visualized, as an optical image. Also spelled visualisation.

We have a problem of visualization—the mind is called upon to supply an optical image.
Proc. Amer. Soc. Psych. Research, I. 311.

★visualize (viz′ū-al-īz), v.; pret. and pp. visualized, ppr. visualizing. [< visual + -ize.] I. trans. To make visual or visible; represent or apprehend in visual terms; view with the mind's eye.

What is this Me? A Voice, a Motion, an Appearance—some embodied, visualized Idea in the Eternal Mind?
Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, i. 8.

Whatever may be the fate of these attempts to visualize the physics of the process, it will still remain true that to account for the phenomena of radiation and absorption we must take into consideration the shape, size, and complexity of the molecules by which the ether is disturbed. Tyndall, Radiation, § 15.

Most persons . . . are less able to visualise the features of intimate friends than those of persons of whom they have caught only a single glance.
F. Galton, Inquiries into Human Faculty, p. 108.

II. intrans. To call up a mental image or picture in visual terms with a distinctness approaching actual vision.

I find that a few persons can, by what they often describe as a kind of touch-sight, visualise at the same moment all round the image of a solid body.
F. Galton, Inquiries into Human Faculty, p. 98.

It is among uncivilised races that natural differences in the visualising faculty are most conspicuous. Many of them make carvings and rude illustrations, but only a few have the gift of carrying a picture in their mind's eye, judging by the completeness and firmness of their designs, which show no trace of having been elaborated in that step-by-step manner which is characteristic of draughtsmen who are not natural artists.
F. Galton, Inquiries into Human Faculty, p. 101.

Also spelled visualise.

★visualizer (viz′ū-ạl-ī-zėr), n. [< visualize + -er[1].] One who visualizes. Also spelled visualiser.

Abnormally sensitive visualizers.
Proc. Amer. Soc. Psych. Research, I. 295.

visually (viz′ū-ạl-i), adv. In a visual manner; by sight; with reference to vision.

These spectral images have only a subjective existence, though visually they have all the vividness of presentment which belongs to realities. Nature, XLI. 417.

Vitaceæ (vī-tā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1836), < Vitis + -aceæ.] A family of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants of the order Rhamnales, the vine family, characterized by a small calyx with imbricated lobes, and valvate caducous petals with the stamens opposite them. There are about 450 species, of which 45, principally of Asia and Africa, forming the genus Leea, are erect tropical shrubs or small trees, with pinnate leaves without tendrils. The others, classed in 10 genera, and forming the subfamily Vitoideæ, are shrubby tendril-bearing climbers or vines, with a copious watery juice, round, angled, or irregular stems thickened at the nodes (rarely herbaceous or subterranean), their wood abounding in large dotted ducts. They bear alternate or petioled leaves, which are simple, lobed, or digitately divided into three to five leaflets. The inflorescence is paniculately cymose or racemose, rarely spicate, and is developed opposite the leaves; the peduncles end in simple or divided tendrils. The small flowers are commonly greenish or inconspicuous. The fruit is a roundish juicy berry, commonly one-celled by obliteration of the two to five partitions, and containing two to five seeds. It is often large, sweet, and edible in Vitis and Cissus, or sometimes acrid, astringent, or intensely acid. Four genera extend into the United States, Vitis, Cissus, Parthenocissus, and Ampelopsis. Ampelocissus also occurs in tropical America; the others are small genera of the Old World. Their leaves are astringent, and sometimes furnish domestic remedies, especially those of tropical species of Cissus; another furnishes a blue dye; but the principal importance of the family is the production of grapes and wine. Pterisanthes, a small aberrant genus, is one of the most singular of plants in its inflorescence, bearing its innumerable small flowers on a thin, flattened wing-like or leaf-like receptacle forming the expanded end of a slender tendril.

vitaile†, vitaille†, n. Obsolete spellings of victual.

★vital (vī′tạl), a. [< ME. vital, < OF. (and F.) vital = Sp. Pg. vital = It. vitale, < L. vitalis, of or belonging to life, < vita, life, < vivere, pp. victus, live, = Skt. √ jīv, live; cf. Gr. βίος, life. From the same root are ult. E. vie[2], vivid, revive, etc.] 1. Of or pertaining to life, either animal or vegetable: as, vital energies.

A raven's note,
Whose dismal tune bereft my vital powers.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. 2. 41.

As for living creatures, it is certain their vital spirits are a substance compounded of an airy and flamy matter.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 30.

2. Contributing to life; necessary to life: as, vital air; vital blood.—3. Containing life; living.

Spirits that live throughout,
Vital in every part. Milton, P. L., vi. 345.

His vital presence? his corporeal mould?
Wordsworth, Laodamia.

She is very haughty,
For all her fragile air of gentleness;
With something vital in her, like those flowers
That on our desolate steppes outlast the year.
T. B. Aldrich, Pauline Pavlovna.

4. Being the seat of life; being that on which life depends; hence, essential to existence; indispensable.

He spoke, and rising hurl'd his forceful Dart,
Which, driv'n by Pallas, pierc'd a vital Part.
Pope, Iliad, v. 352.

A competence is vital to content.
Young, Night Thoughts, vi. 506.

A knowledge of the law and a devotion to its principles are vital to a republic, and lie at the very foundation of its strength. Story, Misc. Writings, p. 512.

5†. Capable of living; viable.

Pythagoras, Hippocrates, . . . and others . . . affirming the birth of the seventh month to be vital.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iv. 12.

Vital air†, an old name for oxygen gas, which is essential to animal life.—Vital capacity of the lungs. See capacity.—Vital center. Same as center of respiration (which see, under respiration).—Vital Christianity. See Christianity, 1 (c).—Vital congruity†, the mode of union of body and soul according to the English Platonists.—Vital contractility, the power of contraction inherent in living muscular tissue.—Vital fluid, the name given by Schultze to a fluid in plants, found in certain vessels called by him vital vessels. It is also termed latex.—Vital force, the animating force in animals and plants. See the first quotation under vitality, 1.—Vital functions. See function.—Vital-germ theory of contagion, the theory that contagious diseases are due to the presence of perverted bioplasts which are descended from others originally healthy.—Vital power, the ability to live, or continue alive; vitality.

The movement of the bioplasm is vital, occurs only during life, and is due to vital power—which vital power of this, the highest form of bioplasm in nature, is in fact the living I. Beale, Bioplasm, p. 209.

Vital principle, that principle upon which, when united with organized matter, the phenomena of life are supposed to depend. See vitality.—Vital sense, cœnesthesis.—Vital tripod. See tripod.

vitalisation, vitalise, etc. See vitalization, etc.

vitalism (vī'tal-izm), n. [< vital + -ism.] In biol., the doctrine that ascribes all the functions of an organism to a vital principle distinct from chemical and other physical forces.

vitalist (vī'tal-ist), n. [= F. vitaliste; < vital + -ist.] A believer in the existence of vital force as distinguished from the other forces operative upon animal and vegetable organisms.

vitalistic (vī-ta-lis'tik), a. [< vitalist + -ic.] 1. Pertaining to or involving the theory of vitalism. Helmholtz, Popular Sci. Lectures (trans.), p. 383.—2. Noting the vital-germ theory of contagion (which see, under vital).

It was no easy thing for him to justify the study of fermentation on the lines suggested by what was called the vitalistic or germ theory. Nature, XLIII. 482.

vitality (vī-tal'i-ti), n. [< F. vitalité = Sp. vitalidad = Pg. vitalidade = It. vitalità, < L. vitalita(t-)s, vital force, life, < vitalis, vital: see vital.] 1. The exhibiting of vital powers or capacities; the principle of animation or of life; vital force. See life.

Undoubtedly a man of genius can out of his own superabundant vitality compel life into the most decrepit vocabulary. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 240.

2. Manifestation of a capacity for enduring and performing certain functions: as, an institution devoid of vitality.

No incredulity or neglect can destroy the innate vitality of truth. Geikie, Geol. Sketches, ii. 30.

vitalization (vī″tal-i-zā'shon), n. [< vitalize + -ation.] The act or process of infusing the vital principle. Also spelled vitalisation.

vitalize (vī'tal-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. vitalized, ppr. vitalizing. [< vital + -ize.] To give life to; render living; give an organic or vital character to. Also spelled vitalise.

It appears that it [organic assimilation] is a force which not only produces motion and chemical change, but also vitalizes the matter on which it acts.
Whewell, Hist. Scientific Ideas, iv. § 3.

vitalizer (vī'tal-ī-zėr), n. [< vitalize + *-er*1.] One who or that which vitalizes. Also spelled vitaliser.

vitally (vī'tal-li), adv. 1. In a vital manner; so as to give life.

The organic structure of human bodies, whereby they are fitted to live and move, and be vitally informed by the soul, is the workmanship of a most wise, powerful, and beneficent Maker. Bentley. (Johnson.)

2. In a manner or degree essential to continued existence; essentially: as, vitally important.

His attainment to a knowledge of God and this instant resistance of Sin are most intimately and vitally related. Neither can advance beyond the other.
Channing, Perfect Life, p. 95.

3. In the vitals; as affecting vital parts; mortally; fatally: as, the animal was vitally hit or hurt.

vitals (vī'talz), n. pl. [Pl. of vital; short for vital parts.] 1. The viscera necessary for vital processes; those interior parts or organs which are essential to life, as the brain, heart, lungs, and stomach: a vague general term.

A slight wound;
Though it pierc'd his body, it hath miss'd the vitals.
Fletcher (and another), Fair Maid of the Inn, ii. 1.

2. The part of any complex whole that is essential to its life or existence, or to a sound state: as, corruption of manners preys upon the vitals of a state.

A mortal disease was upon her vitals before Cæsar had crossed the Rubicon.
Story, Speech, Salem, Sept. 18, 1828.

vitascope (vī'ta-skōp), n. [< L. vita, life, + Gr. σκοπεῖν, view.] An apparatus, based on the principle of the zoëtrope, for projecting a great number of pictures of the same object in rapid succession upon a screen, thus producing the appearance of motion. Cinematograph, electroscope, kinographoscope, and veriscope are names applied to various machines essentially like the vitascope.

The vitascope, a far more complicated and powerful structure [than the kinetoscope], takes this same ribbon which has been prepared by the kinetoscope, and coils it up on a disc at the top of the machine, from which it is passed over a system of wheels and through a narrow, upright clamp-like contrivance that brings it down to a strong magnifying lens, behind which there is an electric burner of high capacity. The light from this carbon burner blazes fiercely through the translucent ribbon, and projects the images on the negatives there, blended, to a distant screen, with great clearness, for the benefit of the audience.
North Amer. Rev., CLXIII. 377.

vitativeness (vī-tā'tiv-nes), n. In phren., the love of life—a faculty assigned to a protuberance under the ear; also, the organ which is supposed to indicate the presence of this faculty.

vitellarian (vit-e-lā'ri-an), a. [< vitellarium + -an.] Of or pertaining to the vitellarium: as, the vitellarian ducts. See cuts under germarium, Trematoda, and Cestoidea. Huxley.

vitellarium (vit-e-lā'ri-um), n.; pl. vitellaria (-ä). [NL., < L. vitellus, yolk: see vitellus.] A special gland of the female generative apparatus of some worms, additional to the germarium, in which gland an accessory vitelline substance is formed. See germarium, and cuts under Trematoda and Rhabdocœla.

vitellary (vit'e-lā-ri), n. and a. [< L. vitellus, yolk: see vitellus.] I.† n. The place where the yolk of an egg swims in the white.

The vitellary or place of the yolk is very high.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 28.

II. a. Same as vitelline.

The vitellary sac of the embryo. Huxley.

vitellicle (vī-tel'i-kl), n. [< NL. vitelliculus*, dim. of vitellus, yolk: see vitellus.] A yolk-sac; the vitelline or vitellary vesicle; the bag which hangs out of the belly of an embryo, in the higher animals called the umbilical vesicle. See cuts under embryo and uterus.

vitelligenous (vit-e-lij'e-nus), a. [< L. vitellus, yolk, + -genus, producing: see -genous.] Producing yolk or vitellus: specifying those cells secreted by the ovarioles of certain insects, which are supposed to supply nutriment to the ova. Also vitellogenous. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 381.

vitellin (vī-tel'in), n. [< vitell(us) + *-in*2.] The chief proteid constituent of the yolk of eggs. It is a white granular body insoluble in water, soluble in dilute salt solutions, and not precipitated by saturation with salt. It is associated with lecithin, and probably combined with it in the yolk of the egg.

vitelline (vī-tel'in), a. and n. [< vitellus + *-ine*1.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the vitellus, or yolk of an egg; forming a vitellus, as protoplasm: said especially of the large mass of food-yolk or deutoplasm of a meroblastic egg, or of the vitellicle.—2. In entom. and bot., colored like the yolk of an egg; deep-yellow with a tinge of red.

Also vitellary.

Vitelline duct. See ductus vitellinus, under ductus, and cut under embryo.—Vitelline membrane. See membrane.—Vitelline sac, the vitellicle, or umbilical vesicle.

II. n. Yolk; the vitellus; the vitellary substance. See I., 1. [Rare.]

vitellogene (vī-tel'ō-jēn), n. [< L. vitellus, yolk, + -genus, producing.] The vitellarium.

vitellogenous (vit-e-loj'e-nus), a. Same as vitelligenous.

vitellolutein (vī-tel-ō-lū'tē-in), n. [< L. vitellus, yolk, + luteus, golden-yellow, + *-in*2.] A yellow coloring matter found in the eggs of the spider-crab, Maia squinado.

vitellorubin (vī-tel-ō-rō'bin), n. [< L. vitellus, yolk, + rub(er), red, + *-in*2.] A reddish-brown coloring matter found in the eggs of Maia squinado.

vitellus (vī-tel'us), n. [NL., < L. vitellus, a yolk, a transferred use of vitellus, a little calf, dim. of vitulus, a calf: see veal.] The yolk of an egg; in the broadest sense, the protoplasm of an ovum; the germinative or formative protoplasmic contents of an ovum-cell, which is transformed into the body of the embryo, plus that substance, if any, which nourishes the embryo during its germination and subsequent growth. Hence, in meroblastic ova, two kinds of vitellus are distinguished, the germ-yolk, or germinative vitellus proper, and the food-yolk, the former forming and the latter nourishing the embryo.—Segmentation of the vitellus. See segmentation.—Vitellus formativus, formative or true yolk. See morpholecithus.—Vitellus nutritivus, food-yolk. See tropholecithus.

Vitex (vī'teks), n. [NL. (Rivinus, 1690), < L. vitex, agnus castus.] A genus of plants, of the family Verbenaceæ, type of the tribe Viticeæ. It is characterized by medium-sized flowers, the corolla with a short tube and very oblique five-cleft or two-lipped limb (its forward lobe larger), by four usually exserted stamens, and by a drupaceous fruit with a single four-celled nutlet. There are about 100 species, widely dispersed throughout warm regions, a few extending into temperate parts of Asia and southern Europe. They are trees or shrubs bearing opposite leaves, which are commonly composed of three to seven digitate entire or toothed thin or coriaceous leaflets. The flowers are white, blue, violet, or yellowish, and form cymes which are loose and widely forking, or short, dense, and sometimes almost contracted into a head. The genus is somewhat aromatic; several species are tender shrubs cultivated under glass. V. Agnus castus, a deciduous shrub from Sicily and the Mediterranean, is cultivated in many forms, as with variegated leaves, etc., under the names chaste-tree, Abraham's-balm, hemp-tree, monk's pepper-tree, and especially agnus castus (which see, under agnus). V. trifolia is known in India as wild pepper. V. pubescens (V. arborea) of the East Indies is an evergreen reaching 50 feet in height, known as tree-vitex. Many species produce a valuable wood, as V. Lignum-vitæ, the lignum-vitæ of Queensland, and V. capitata, the bois lézard of Trinidad, Guiana, and Brazil, or a durable building-timber, especially V. littoralis, the New Zealand teak or puriri, which is considered indestructible in water. The last is a large tree sometimes 5 feet in diameter, bearing spreading branches of dull-red hairy flowers an inch long. (See puriri, and New Zealand teak (under teak).) V. umbrosa of the West Indies is one of the trees known as boxwood or fiddlewood.

Flowering Plant of Vitex Agnus-castus.
a, a flower.

vitial† (vish'i-al), a. [< L. vitium, a fault, vice, + -al.] Faulty; corrupt; vicious.

There is nothing on it [the earth] that is of it which is not become more vitial than vital.
Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 337.

vitiate (vish'i-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. vitiated, ppr. vitiating. [Formerly also viciate; < L. vitiatus, pp. of vitiare (> It. viziare = Sp. Pg. viciar = F. vicier), make faulty, injure, spoil, corrupt, < vitium, a fault, imperfection: see *vice*1.] 1. To render vicious, faulty, or imperfect; injure the quality or substance of; cause to be defective; impair; spoil; corrupt: as, a vitiated taste.

This beauteous Maid [Venice] hath been often attempted to be viciated. Howell, Letters, I. i. 30.

Wholesome meats to a vitiated stomack differ little or nothing from unwholesome. Milton, Areopagitica, p. 16.

2. To cause to fail of effect, either in whole or in part; render invalid or of no effect; destroy the validity or binding force of, as of a legal instrument or a transaction; divest of legal value or authority; invalidate: as, any undue influence exerted on a jury vitiates their verdict; fraud vitiates a contract; a court is vitiated by the presence of unqualified persons sitting as members of it.

The least defect of self-possession vitiates, in my judgment, the entire relation [friendship].
Emerson, Friendship.

=Syn. 1. Pollute, Corrupt, etc. (see *taint*1), debase, deprave.

vitiation (vish-i-ā'shon), n. [< L. vitiatio(n-), violation, corruption, < vitiare, corrupt, vitiate: see vitiate.] The act of vitiating. Specifically—(a) Impairment; corruption: as, vitiation of the blood.

The strong vitiation of the German idiom with English words and expressions. Amer. Jour. Philol., X. 315.

(b) A rendering invalid or illegal: as, the vitiation of a contract or a court.

vitiator (vish'i-ā-tor), n. [< L. vitiator, < vitiare, corrupt, vitiate: see vitiate.] One who or that which vitiates.

You cannot say in your profession Plus non vitiat; plus is the worst vitiator and violator of the Muses.
Landor, Imag. Conv., Southey and Porson, ii.

Viticeæ (vī-tis'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Schauer, 1847), ‹ Vitex (-ic-) + -eæ.] A tribe of dicotyledonous plants, belonging to the family Verbenaceæ. It is characterized by an ultimately centrifugal cymose inflorescence composed of opposite dichotomous cymes aggregated into a trichotomous, thyrsoid, pyramidal, or corymbose panicle, and by an ovary with the ovules laterally affixed, commonly at first imperfectly but soon perfectly four-celled, drupaceous, and entire or four-lobed in fruit, usually pulpy or fleshy, the endocarp of four nutlets, or forming a single four-celled nutlet. It includes 6 genera, of which Vitex (the type) and Premna are the chief. In the system of Bentham and Hooker it was made practically equivalent to the family Viticoideæ of Engler, and included 18 genera.

viticide (vit'i-sīd), n. [‹ L. vitis, vine, + -cīda, ‹ cædere, kill.] That which injures or destroys the grape or vine; a vine-pest, as the phylloxera.

viticolous (vī-tik'ō-lus), a. [‹ L. vitis, the vine, + colere, inhabit.] In bot. and zoöl., inhabiting or produced upon the vine, as very many parasitic and saprophytic fungi and various insects.

viticula (vī-tik'ū-lạ), n.; pl. viticulæ (-lē). [NL., dim. of L. vitis, vine: see Vitis.] In bot., a trailing stem, as of a cucumber.

viticulose (vī-tik'ū-lōs), a. [‹ viticula + -ose.] In bot., producing long, trailing, vine-like twigs or stems; sarmentaceous.

viticultural (vit-i-kul'tūr-ạl), a. [‹ viticulture + -al.] Of or pertaining to viticulture: as, viticultural implements or treatises.

Of the Austrian-Hungarian empire Hungary, from a viticultural point of view, forms by far the most important part. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 610.

viticulturalist (vit-i-kul'tūr-ạl-ist), n. [‹ viticultural + -ist.] A viticulturist. Elect. Rev. (Amer.), XIII. xviii. 4. [Rare.]

viticulture (vit'i-kul-tūr), n. [‹ F. viticulture, ‹ L. vitis, vine, + cultura, culture.] The culture or cultivation of the vine.

viticulturist (vit-i-kul'tūr-ist), n. [‹ viticulture + -ist.] One whose business is viticulture; a grape-grower.

To aid in these researches, relations have already been opened with horticulturists and viticulturists.
Nature, XLIII. 38.

Vitiflora (vit-i-flō'rạ), n. [NL. (Leach, 1816), ‹ L. vitis, vine, + flos (flor-), flower.] A genus of chats: a strict synonym of Saxicola. Also called Œnanthe.

Vitiflorinæ (vit″i-flō-rī'nē), n. pl. [NL., ‹ Vitiflora + -inæ.] A subfamily of birds: synonymous with Saxicolinæ.

vitiligo (vit-i-lī'gō), n. [NL., ‹ L. vitiligo, tetter.] A loss of pigment in one or more circumscribed parts of the skin, with increase of pigment in the skin immediately about such patches. Also called acquired leucodermia or leucopathia.

vitiligoidea (vit″i-li-goi'dē-ạ), n. [‹ L. vitiligo, tetter, + -oidea.] A skin-disease characterized by yellowish patches or tubercles, situated usually on the eyelids; xanthoma.

vitilitigate (vit-i-lit'i-gāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. vitilitigated, ppr. vitilitigating. [‹ L. vitilitigatus, pp. of vitilitigare, quarrel disgracefully, calumniate, ‹ vitium, a fault, vice (see vice[1]), + litigare, quarrel: see litigate.] To contend in law litigiously, captiously, or vexatiously. Bailey, 1731.

vitilitigation (vit-i-lit-i-gā'shọn), n. [‹ vitilitigate + -ion.] Vexatious or quarrelsome litigation.

It is a most toylsome taske to run the wild goose chase after a well-breath'd Opinionist; they delight in vitilitigation. N. Ward, Simple Cobler, p. 16.

I'll force you by right ratiocination
To leave your vitilitigation.
S. Butler, Hudibras, I. iii. 1262.

vitiosity (vish-i-os'i-ti), n.; pl. vitiosities (-tiz). [‹ L. vitiosita(t-)s, corruption, vice, ‹ vitiosus, corrupt, vicious: see vicious.] The state of being vicious or vitiated; a corrupted state; depravation; a vicious property.

My untamed affections and confirmed vitiosity makes me daily do worse. Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, i. 42.

Vitiosities whose newness and monstrosity of nature admits no name. Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici.

vitioust, vitiouslyt, etc. Obsolete spellings of vicious, etc.

Vitis (vī'tis), n. [NL. (Malpighi, 1675; earlier by Brunfels, 1530), ‹ L. vitis, a vine, ‹ viere (√ vi), twist, wind: see withe, withy. Hence (‹ L. vitis) ult. E. vise[1].] A genus of plants, including the grape, type of the family Vitaceæ. It is characterized by polygamodiœcious flowers, each with a cap of 5 coherent caducous petals. From Cissus, its tropical representative, it is further distinguished by its conical or thickened (not subulate) style; and from the other genera, as Parthenocissus, the common Virginia creeper or American ivy, by its pyriform seeds. There are about 40 species, natives of the northern hemisphere, chiefly within temperate regions. They are shrubby climbers with simple or lobed leaves (rarely digitate, like Parthenocissus), and long branching tendrils produced opposite the leaves, and also from the flower-stalk. The inflorescence is a thyrsus of inconspicuous flowers, often very fragrant, usually greenish, and peculiar in the fall of the unopened petals without expansion. The fruit, a pulpy berry, is normally two-celled and with two to four seeds, to which the pulp adheres in the American, but does not in the one or two European species. By Planchon (1872) the genus is divided into two sections—Euvitis, with a peculiar thin brown fibrous bark which soon separates and hangs in shreddy plates; and Muscadinia, consisting of V. rotundifolia, the muscadine, and V. Munsoniana, the bird-grape of Georgia and Florida, peculiar in their closely adherent punctate bark, nearly elliptical seeds, somewhat cymose inflorescence, and unbranched tendrils. The most important species, V. vinifera, is the vine of southern and central Europe, known in America as the European, hot-house, or California grape, native in Turkey, Persia, and Tatary, probably also in Greece and in the Himalayas, and now cultivated in the Old World from nearly 55° north to about 40° south latitude, sometimes up to the altitude of 3,000 feet. In England its fruit ripens in the open air only in favorable seasons, although in the eleventh and twelfth centuries an inferior wine was there made from it. It grows in all soils, but best in those which are light and gravelly. Some individuals in warm climates have attained in centuries a trunk 3 feet in diameter. In the United States the climate is not favorable to it, except in California. It is the source of thousands of varieties, obtained by propagation from seed. To continue the original variety in cultivation, propagation by layers, cuttings, grafting, or inoculation is practised. (See vine and grape, also wine, raisin, and currant.) The species are most abundant in the United States, there estimated by Munson at 23; they are especially numerous in Texas, which has 14 species, or 8 as recognized by Coulter. The eastern United States is thought richer in useful species than any other part of the world, 4 of the 8 Atlantic species having given rise to valuable cultivated varieties. Of these V. Labrusca, the common wild grape of the New England coast, extends from Canada through the Atlantic States to Tennessee, and from Japan to the Himalayas; it is the source of the Concord, Isabella, Catawba, Iona, Diana, and other grapes, and some claim that an Asiatic hybrid between it and V. vulpina was the original of V. vinifera. V. bicolor (formerly included with V. æstivalis), the blue or winter grape, occurs from New York to Michigan and southward; and V. æstivalis, the summer grape, from New England to Louisiana. From these come the Delaware and the most promising native American red-wine grapes, as the Cynthiana and Norton's Virginia. V. vulpina, the river-grape, is widely distributed through all the Northern States and Canada to Colorado, and is the only Rocky Mountain species; in cultivation it is extensively used in France to supply phylloxera-proof stock for fine wine-producing varieties of V. vinifera. Many other valuable varieties have been formed from the American grapes by hybridizing with one another or with V. vinifera; these hybrids are in general proof against the phylloxera, and include by far the best American table-grapes. Another North Atlantic species, V. cordifolia, the frost-, chicken-, or possum-grape, ranges from New England to Nebraska and the Gulf of Mexico, and is the most common of the 3 species of Canada. It produces small blackish or amber-colored fruit, sometimes used, after it has been touched by frost, for preserves. Among these species, V. vulpina is readily distinguished by its leaves with the lobes and sinuses acute and its growing tips enveloped with young undeveloped leaves, and V. cordifolia by leaves with both sides smooth and shining. Some others have the upper surface dark-green and more or less rugose; the lower in V. bicolor bluish with a bloom, in V. æstivalis dusty-flocculent, with short broad stipules, and in V. Labrusca densely white or rusty with close tomentum, with long cordate stipules. Their berries are mostly small—in V. bicolor and V. æstivalis apt to be astringent and white-dotted; those of V. Labrusca and V. rotundifolia, the fox-grapes, have a musky or foxy taste or odor (see fox-grape). The latter, the muscadine or bullace grape, the source of the scuppernong (which see), is the largest-fruited American species, and extends from Maryland to Texas, and from Japan to the Himalayas. Many other American species are quite local; 3 are confined to Florida, 6 mainly to Texas, as V. candicans, the mustang or cutthroat grape, and V. monticola, the sweet mountain grape; several others are nearly restricted to the Mississippi valley, as V. cinerea, the sweet winter grape, and V. palmata, an ornamental species. V. Arizonica, the cañon-grape of Arizona, and V. Girdiana, of southern California, are small-fruited species; V. Californica, the vaumee of the Indians, bears large clusters of purple fruit of rather pleasant flavor. V. Caribæa is the Jamaica grape or water-withe of the West Indies, Mexico, and Central America. The only other American species not found in the United States is V. Blancoii of the Sierra Madre. A few species are peculiar to Asia, 5 to Japan, China, and India, V. Amurensis to Siberia. The numerous tropical and south temperate species formerly ascribed to Vitis are now referred to Cissus, including about 10 in Australia. Several in mountains of India and Java produce edible fruit; 3 extend within the southern United States, 1 in Texas, the ornamental vine known as yerba del buey, Cissus incisa, 2 in Florida, Cissus sicyoides, for which see china-root and bastard bryony (under bryony), and C. acida, the sorrel-vine.

Vitis Labrusca.
a, inflorescence; b, apex of branch with leaves and tendrils; c, leaf.

vitlert, n. An obsolete spelling of victualer.

vitoe, n. [Tupi.] A South American nocturnal monkey of the genus Nyctipithecus, as N. felinus, the eia. See dourocouli.

vitrea[1], n. Plural of vitreum.

vitrea[2] (vit'rē-ạ), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. vitreus, of glass: see vitreous.] A term used for antique glass vessels or fragments of the same. H. S. Cuming, J. A. A., X. 192.

vitrella (vī-trel'ạ), n.; pl. vitrellæ (-ē). [NL., ‹ vitreum + dim. -ella.] Same as retinophora.

Ommatidium consists of two corneagen cells, four vitrellæ, and seven retinular cells. Amer. Nat., XXIV. 356.

vitremitet, n. An unexplained word which occurs in the following lines:

She that helmed was in starke stoures,
And wan by force tounes stronge and toures,
Shal on hir heed now were a vitremyte.
Chaucer, Monk's Tale, l. 382.

[The early editions read autremite, the Six Texts and Tyrwhitt read as here, and the Harleian MS. has wyntermyte. Skeat conjectures that it means a 'glass head-dress,' as contrasted with a helmet. Nothing as yet really satisfactory has been proposed.]

vitreodentinal (vit″rē-ō-den'ti-nal), a. [‹ vitreodentine + -al.] Of the character of vitreodentine; pertaining to vitreodentine.

vitreodentine (vit″rē-ō-den'tin), n. [‹ L. vitreus, of glass, + E. dentine.] A variety of dentine of particularly hard texture, as distinguished from osteodentine and vasodentine.

vitreo-electric (vit″rē-ō-ē-lek'trik), a. [‹ L. vitreus, of glass, + E. electric.] Containing or exhibiting positive electricity, or electricity similar to that which is excited by rubbing glass.

vitreosity (vit-rē-os'i-ti), n. [‹ vitreous + -ity.] Vitreousness.

The pages bristle with "hard words," some of which are new to science. Vitreosity has an uncanny sound. Nature, XLI. 49.

vitreous (vit'rē-us), a. and n. [Cf. F. vitreux and Sp. vítreo = Pg. It. vitreo; ‹ L. vitreus, of glass, ‹ vitrum, glass, orig. vidtrum*, a transparent substance, ‹ videre, see: see vision. Cf. vitrine, verre, etc.] I. a. 1. Of, pertaining to, or obtained from glass; resembling glass.—2. Consisting of glass: as, a vitreous substance.—3. Resembling glass in some respects; glassy: thus, an object may be vitreous in its hardness, in its gloss, in its structure, etc. Specifically, in anat. and zoöl. vitriform; glassy; like glass—(a) in transparency, as a clear jelly may resemble glass; hyaloid: as, the vitreous body or humor of the eye; (b) in translucency, thinness, or smoothness; hyaline: as, a vitreous shell; (c) in hardness and brittleness: as, the vitreous tablets of the skull; (d) in mode of cleavage; clean-cut: as, a vitreous fracture; (e) in chemical composition; silicious: as, a vitreous sponge.—Vitreous body of the eye, the pellucid gelatinous substance which fills about four fifths of the ball of the eye, behind the crystalline lens; the vitreous humor or lens. See cut under eye[1].—Vitreous degeneration. Same as hyaline degeneration (which see, under hyaline).—Vitreous electricity, electricity produced by rubbing glass, as distinguished from resinous electricity. See electricity.—Vitreous humor of the ear, the fluid filling the membranous labyrinth of the ear: same as endolymph.—Vitreous humor of the eye, the vitreum.—Vitreous lens, the vitreous body of the eye: correlated with crystalline lens.—Vitreous mesochorus, Mesochorus vitreus, a hymenopterous hyperparasite which was supposed to destroy the army-worm.—Vitreous mosaic, mosaic the tesseræ of which are of glass, especially in jewelry for personal adornment, where it differs from enamel-work in that the pieces of glass are cut out cold and inlaid like gems.—Vitreous silver. See silver.—Vitreous sponge, a silicious sponge; a glass-sponge: correlated with gelatinous, fibrous, and calcareous sponge. See cut under Euplectella.—Vitreous structure, in lithol. Properly speaking, in a perfectly vitreous rock there is an entire absence of structure, and of any appearance of individualization: such glassy material has no influence on polarized light. Inasmuch, however, as a perfectly vitreous condition is very rare, devitrification having almost always been begun at least, lithologists sometimes for convenience use the term structure in designating a rock as vitreous, or speak of a "vitreous structure."—Vitreous table (or tablet) of the skull. See table, n., 1 (c).—Vitreous warts of Descemet's membrane, minute roundish transparent bodies frequently found near the border of Descemet's membrane, on the posterior surface of the cornea.

Vitreous Mesochorus. (Line shows natural size.)

II. n. The vitreous body of the eye.

vitreousness (vit'rē-us-nes), n. The state or quality of being vitreous; vitreosity.

vitrescence (vi-tres′ens), n. [< vitrescen(t) + -ce.] The state of becoming glassy, or of growing to resemble glass.

vitrescent (vi-tres′ent), a. [< L. vitrum, glass, + -escent.] Turning into glass; tending to become glass.

vitrescible (vi-tres′i-bl), a. [= F. vitrescible; as vitresc(ent) + -ible.] Capable of becoming glassy, or of being turned into glass.

vitreum (vit′rē-um), n.; pl. vitrea (-ä). [NL., neut. of L. vitreus, glassy: see vitreous.] The corpus vitreum, vitreous body, or vitreous humor of the eye. See cut under eye[1].

vitric (vit′rik), a. [< L. vitrum, glass, + -ic.] Of the nature of, or pertaining to, glass or any vitreous material.

vitrics (vit′riks), n. [Pl. of vitric: see -ics.] 1. Glass and glassy materials in general.—2. The study or history of glass and glass-manufacture. Compare ceramics.

vitrifaction (vit-ri-fak′shon), n. [< L. vitrum, glass, + facere, pp. factus, make, do: see faction.] 1. The art or operation of turning into glass.—2. The act or process of becoming glass.

vitrifacture (vit-ri-fak′tūr), n. [< L. vitrum, glass, + factura, a making: see facture.] The manufacture of glass.

vitrifiability (vit-ri-fī-a-bil′i-ti), n. [< vitrifiable + -ity (see -bility).] The property of being vitrifiable.

vitrifiable (vit′ri-fī-a-bl), a. [< F. vitrifiable; as vitrify + -able.] Capable of being vitrified or converted into glass by heat and fusion: as, flint and alkalis are vitrifiable.—Vitrifiable colors. See color.

vitrificable (vit-rif′i-ka-bl), a. [< vitrific(ate) + -able.] Same as vitrifiable. [Rare.]

vitrificate (vit′ri-fi-kāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. vitrificated, ppr. vitrificating. [< NL. vitrificatus*, pp. of vitrificare*, vitrify: see vitrify.] To vitrify. [Rare.]

vitrification (vit″ri-fi-kā′shon), n. [< F. vitrification = Sp. vitrificación = Pg. vitrificação = It. vitrificazione; as vitrificate + -ion.] Conversion into glass, or in general into a material having a glassy or vitreous structure. Some minerals and most rocks, when fused, are converted into a more or less perfect glass, or become vitrified. This is the case when the melted material cools rapidly; but if cooled slowly more or less complete devitrification takes place, and a lithoid structure is the result. See devitrification.

vitrified (vit′ri-fīd), p. a. Converted into glass; hence, by extension, partially converted into glass, as having the exterior converted into a glaze, or having the substance hard and glassy from exposure to heat: as, vitrified tiles.—Vitrified fort or wall, one of a type of early native defensive structures found in Scotland, France, etc., in which heavy walls of silicious stone have been exposed to fire, with the result that they have become to some extent vitrified. There has been much discussion as to whether this is an accidental result of the burning of wooden superstructures or of later structures built against the walls, or whether it is an effect sought purposely by the builders with the view of making the walls more solid. See vitrification.

vitriform (vit′ri-fôrm), a. [< L. vitrum, glass, + forma, form.] Having the form or appearance of glass; vitreous in appearance.

vitrify (vit′ri-fī), v.; pret. and pp. vitrified, ppr. vitrifying. [< F. vitrifier = Sp. Pg. vitrificar = It. vitrificare, < NL. vitrificare*, < L. vitrum, glass, + -ficare, < facere, make, do (see -fy).] I. trans. To convert into glass by the action of heat. See glass.

II. intrans. To become glass; be converted into glass.

Chymists make vessels of animal substances calcin'd, which will not vitrify in the fire.
Arbuthnot, Aliments, iv. § 1.

Vitrina (vi-trī′nä), n. [NL. (Drapiez, 1801), < L. vitrum, glass: see vitreous.] 1. The typical genus of Vitrinidæ, having a very thin, delicate, and transparent shell; glass-snails, as V. pellucida, V. limpida, etc.—2. [l. c.] A glass-snail of this genus.

vitrine (vit′rin), n. [< F. vitrine, < vitre, window-glass, < L. vitrum, glass.] A show-case; a case or inclosure of glass for the display of delicate articles, whether in a museum, a private house, or a shop.

Many caskets and vases are in upright vitrines standing on the floor, while numerous larger works are in wall cases.
Athenæum, No. 3207, p. 480.

Vitrinidæ (vī-trin′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Vitrina + -idæ.] A family of monotrematous geophilous pulmoniferous gastropods, typified by the genus Vitrina; the glass-snails. They have the shell heliciform, very thin, too small to contain the animal, and of a few rapidly enlarging whorls; the jaw ribless and smooth or striate, the teeth differentiated into a median tricuspid one, lateral ones bicuspid or tricuspid, and marginal ones aculeate, unicuspid, or bicuspid. The species are numerous. Also Vitrininæ, as a subfamily of Limacidæ or of Helicidæ.

vitrinoid (vit′ri-noid), a. [< Vitrina + -oid.] Like a glass-snail; resembling the Vitrinidæ, or related to them.

Helicarion has a vitrinoid shell.
P. P. Carpenter, Lect. on Mollusca (1861), p. 79.

★vitriol (vit′ri-ol), n. [Formerly also vitrioll; < ME. vitriol, vitriole, < OF. (and F.) vitriol = Sp. Pg. It. vitriolo = D. vitriool = G. Sw. Dan. vitriol, < ML. vitriolum, vitriol, neut. of vitriolus, var. of LL. vitreolus, of glass, glass, dim. of L. vitreus, of glass: see vitreous.] Sulphuric acid, or one of many of its compounds, which in certain states have a glassy appearance.

Cered pokets, sal peter, vitriole.
Chaucer, Prol. to Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 255.

Blue vitriol, copper vitriol, hydrous copper sulphate. When found in nature, it is called chalcanthite or cyanosite.—Elixir of vitriol. See elixir.—Green vitriol. Same as copperas; in mineral., the species melanterite.—Lead vitriol. Same as anglesite.—Nickel vitriol, hydrated nickel sulphate; in mineral., the species morenosite.—Oil of vitriol, concentrated sulphuric acid.—Red iron vitriol, in mineral., same as botryogen.—Red vitriol, a sulphate of cobalt; in mineral., the species bieberite. Also called cobalt-vitriol.—Roman vitriol, copper sulphate, or blue vitriol.—Salt of vitriol, zinc sulphate.—Vitriol of Mars, iron sulphate.—White or zinc vitriol, hydrated zinc sulphate; in mineral., the species goslarite.

vitriolate (vit′ri-ō-lāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. vitriolated, ppr. vitriolating. [< vitriol + -ate[2].] To convert into a vitriol, as iron pyrites by the absorption of oxygen, which reduces the iron to an oxid, and the sulphur to sulphuric acid. Thus, the sulphid of iron when vitriolated becomes sulphate of iron, or green vitriol. Also vitriolize.

vitriolate (vit′ri-ō-lāt), a. [< vitriolate, v.] Converted into a vitriol or a sulphate.

vitriolation (vit″ri-ō-lā′shon), n. [< vitriolate + -ion.] The act or process of converting into a vitriol or a sulphate. Also vitriolization.

vitriolic (vit-ri-ol′ik), a. [= F. vitriolique = Sp. vitriólico = Pg. It. vitriolico; as vitriol + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to vitriol; having the properties of vitriol, or obtained from vitriol.

We were fain to have recourse to the rum, a horrid, vitriolic beverage, which burned our throats and stomachs like melted lead. B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 166.

2. Biting; caustic; very severe or censorious.

Sensitive to his vitriolic criticism.
O. W. Holmes, Account of the Composition of "The Last [Leaf."

Vitriolic acid†, an obsolete name for oil of vitriol, or sulphuric acid.—Vitriolic ether, sulphuric ether.

vitrioline (vit′ri-ō-lin), a. [< vitriol + -ine[1].] Of, pertaining to, or resembling vitriol; vitriolic.

A spring of a vitrioline taste and odour.
Fuller, Worthies, Yorkshire, III. 396.

The Air and Weather dissolving the Stones, the Rain falling upon them carries away with it the Vitrioline Juice or Salt dissolved. Ray, Eng. Words (ed. 1691), p. 198.

vitriolizable (vit′ri-ol-ī-za-bl), a. [< vitriolize + -able.] Capable of being converted into a vitriol.

vitriolization (vit″ri-ol-i-zā′shon), n. [= F. vitriolisation = Sp. vitriolización; as vitriolize + -ation.] Same as vitriolation.

vitriolize (vit′ri-ol-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. vitriolized, ppr. vitriolizing. [= Sp. vitriolizar; as vitriol + -ize.] 1. Same as vitriolate.—2. To poison or injure with vitriol.

The jury did not believe that the child from the same motive vitriolized himself.
Daily News (London), March 15, 1886. (Encyc. Dict.)

vitriolous† (vit′ri-ol-us), a. [< vitriol + -ous.] Containing vitriol; vitriolic.

vitro-di-trina (vit′rō-di-trē′nä), n. [It.: vitro, glass; di, of; trina, lace, galloon.] Lacework glass, especially that in which the white threads are crossed at an angle forming lozenge-shaped compartments, every one of which, in some specimens, contains a small air-bubble. Compare reticulated glass, under glass.

vitrophyre (vit′rō-fīr), n. [< L. vitrum, glass, + (por)phyr(ites), porphyry.] The name given by Vogelsang to a subdivision of the porphyritic rocks in which the ground-mass consists essentially of a glassy matter. See granophyre.

vitrophyric (vit-rō-fir′ik), a. [< vitrophyre + -ic.] Consisting of, or having the characters of, vitrophyre.

Among the pyroxenic rocks the most noticeable varieties are the labradorite-andesites, the pyroxene-andesites —of which both "trachytoid" and "vitrophyric" forms occur. Philos. Mag., XXIX. 288.

Vitruvian (vi-trō′vi-an), a. [< L. Vitruvius (see def.) + -an.] Of or pertaining to Marcus Vitruvius Pollio, a Roman architect of the latter part of the first century B. C., the author of an important treatise on architecture, which, although its statements can be accepted only after careful criticism, preserves much that is valuable regarding Greek and Roman art.—Vitruvian scroll, an architectural ornament named after Vitruvius, consisting of a series of convoluted scrolls, of fanciful and varied effect. It frequently occurs in friezes of the Composite order.

vitry (vit′ri), n. A fine kind of canvas, for making paulins and powder-cloths. Farrow, Mil. Encyc., I. 361.

vitta (vit′ä), n.; pl. vittæ (-ē). [NL., < L. vitta, a band, a fillet, < viere, bend or twist together, plait.] 1. A headband, fillet, or garland; specifically, among the ancient Greeks and Romans, a band or fillet used as a decoration of sacred persons or things, as of priests, victims, statues, and altars.—2. One of the infulæ or lappets of a miter.—3. In bot., an oil-tube, or receptacle for oil, found in the fruits of most Umbelliferæ. They are longitudinal canals or tubes filled with an aromatic or peculiar secretion. Their usual position is in the intervals between the ridges of the fruit, where they occur singly or in groups. Their number, size, position, etc., are of great systematic value. See oil-tube.

Vittæ of the fruits of (1) spotted cowbane, (2) celery, and (3) parsley. The black spots indicate the vittæ in the transverse sections of these fruits.

4. In zoöl., a band; a streak or stripe, as of color or texture; a fascia.

vittate (vit′āt), a. [< L. vittatus, bound with a fillet, < vitta, a fillet: see vitta.] Provided with or having a vitta or vittæ; in bot., also, striped longitudinally.

vittlet, n. An obsolete spelling of victual.

vitular (vit′ū-lär), a. [< L. vitulus, a calf: see veal.] Of or pertaining to, or connected with, calves.—Vitular or vitulary apoplexy, apoplexy occurring in cows during parturition.—Vitular or vitulary fever. Same as vitular apoplexy.

vitulary (vit′ū-lā-ri), a. Same as vitular.

vituline (vit′ū-lin), a. [< L. vitulinus, of or pertaining to a calf or veal, < vitulus, a calf: see veal.] 1. Of or pertaining to a calf or veal.

If a double allowance of vituline brains deserve such honor [to be exhibited as a wonder as a double-headed calf], there are few commentators on Shakespeare that would have gone afoot.
Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 167.

2. Like a calf in some respect: as, the vituline seal, the common harbor-seal, Phoca vitulina.

vituperable (vī-tū′pe-ra-bl), a. [< ME. vituperable, < OF. vituperable = Sp. vituperable = Pg. vituperavel = It. vituperabile, < L. vituperabilis, blamable, < vituperare, blame: see vituperate.] Deserving of or liable to vituperation; censurable; blameworthy. Caxton.

vituperate (vī-tū′pe-rāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. vituperated, ppr. vituperating. [< L. vituperatus, pp. of vituperare (> It. vituperare = Pg. Sp. vituperar = F. vitupérer), blame, censure, < vilium, fault, defect, + parare, furnish, provide, contrive.] To address abusive language to; find fault with abusively; abuse verbally; rate; objurgate.

The incensed priests . . . continued to raise their voices, vituperating each other in bad Latin.
Scott, Ivanhoe, xxxiii.

The Earl [Leicester] hated Norris more bitterly than before, and was perpetually vituperating him.
Motley, Hist. Netherlands, II. 514.

=Syn. To revile, vilify, berate, upbraid, rail at. The person or creature vituperated is directly addressed.

vituperation (vī-tū-pe-rā′shon), n. [< OF. F. vituperation = Sp. vituperación = Pg. vituperação = It. vituperazione, < L. vituperatio(n-), blame, censure, < vituperare, blame: see vitu- perate.] The act of vituperating; censure with abusive terms; abuse; railing.

When a man becomes untractable and inaccessible by fierceness and pride, then vituperation comes upon him, and privation of honour follows him.
Donne, Hist. Septuagint (1633), p. 155.

=Syn. Objurgation, scolding, reviling, upbraiding.

vituperative (vī-tū′pe-rā-tiv), a. [= It. vituperativo; as vituperate + -ive.] Serving to vituperate; containing or expressing abusive censure; abusive.

As these Cleopatra barges floated along with their soft burden, torrents of vituperative epithet were poured upon them by the rough children of Neptune.
W. Ware, Zenobia, I. 3.

=Syn. Opprobrious, scurrilous.

vituperatively (vī-tū′pe-rā-tiv-li), adv. In a vituperative manner; with vituperation; abusively.

vituperator (vī-tū′pe-rā-tor), n. [= Sp. Pg. vituperador = It. vituperatore, < L. vituperator, a blamer, a censurer, < vituperare, blame: see vituperate.] One who vituperates; one who censures abusively; a reprehender; a reviler.

The election of Luttrell, one of the fiercest vituperators of the City democrats. Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., xiii.

vituperious† (vī-tū-pē′ri-us), a. [Irreg. < vituper(ate) + -i-ous.] Constituting or conveying vituperation; disgraceful. [Rare.]

A vituperious and vile name.
Shelton, tr. of Don Quixote, iv. 6. (Latham.)

viure (vē′ūr), n. [OF. viure.] In her., a very slender band or ribbon which may cross the field in any direction, and as to the width and character of which much liberty is allowed. Thus, a viure nebuly in bend may be a ribbon curved like the line nebuly, and having a general direction bendwise. Also wiure and viurie.

viuva (vyö′vä), n. [Pg., widow.] A fish, Sebastodes ovalis, one of the rockfishes of the coast of California, where it is found in deep water, and is not common. The body is deep, with almost oval profile; the color is olivaceous tinged with light red, especially on the under parts, and variously spotted with black both on the body and on the fins; the length attained is a foot or more.

viva (vē′vä), interj. [It. (= F. vive), (long) live, 3d pers. sing. impv. of vivere, < L. vivere, live.] An Italian exclamation corresponding to the French vive, 'long live.' Often used substantively: as, the vivas of the crowd.

Whereat the popular exultation drunk
With indrawn vivas the whole sunny air,
While through the murmuring windows rose and sunk
A cloud of kerchiefed hands.
Mrs. Browning, Casa Guidi Windows, i.

vivace (vē-vä′che), a. [It., = E. vivacious.] In music, lively: noting passages to be rendered with rapidity of pace and brilliancy of style. The term is used either absolutely or to qualify indications of pace, as allegro vivace.

vivacious (vī- or vi-vā′shus), a. [= F. vivace = Sp. Pg. vivaz = It. vivace, < L. vivax (vivac-), lively, quick, eager, also tenacious of life, long-lived, < vivere, live: see vivid.] 1. Having vigorous powers of life; long-lived; tenacious of life.

Though we should allow them their perpetual calm and equability of heat, they will never be able to prove that therefore men would be so vivacious as they would have us believe. Bentley.

'Tis in the Seventh Æneid — what, the Eighth?
Right — thanks, Abate — though the Christian 's dumb,
The Latinist 's vivacious in you yet!
Browning, Ring and Book, II. 290.

2. Lively; active; sprightly in temper or conduct; proceeding from or characterized by sprightliness.

People of a more vivacious temper . . . [than] mere Hollanders. Howell, Forreine Travell (ed. Arber), p. 62.

Here, if the poet had not been vivacious.
Steele, Spectator, No. 43.

=Syn. 2. Animated, brisk, gay, merry, jocund, light-hearted, sportive, frolicsome. See animation.

vivaciously (vī- or vi-vā′shus-li), adv. In a vivacious manner; with vivacity, life, or spirit.

vivaciousness (vī- or vi-vā′shus-nes), n. 1†. The state of being long-lived; longevity.

Such their . . . vivaciousness they outlive most men.
Fuller, Worthies, Devonshire, I. 399.

2. The state or character of being vivacious; vivacity; liveliness. Bailey, 1727.

vivacissimo (vē-vä-chis′i-mō), a. [It., superl. of vivace: see vivace.] In music, very lively: noting passages to be rendered with great rapidity and brilliancy.

vivacity (vī- or vi-vas′i-ti), n. [< F. vivacité = Sp. vivacidad = Pg. vivacidade = It. vivacità, < L. vivacita(t-)s, vital force, tenacity or vigor of life, < vivax (vivac-), lively, tenacious of life: see vivacious.] 1†. Vital force; vigor.

Aire, . . . of all the Elements the most noble, and fullest of vivacitie and liuelyhood.
Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 156.

2†. Tenacity of life; hence, length of life; longevity.

James Sands of Horborn . . . in this county is most remarkable for his vivacity; for he lived . . . 140 years.
Fuller, Worthies, Staffordshire, III. 140.

3. Liveliness of manner or character; sprightliness of temper or behavior; animation; life; briskness; cheerfulness; spirit.

Heat and vivacity in age is an excellent composition for business. Bacon, Youth and Age.

It is remarkable that those who want any one sense possess the others with greater force and vivacity.
Steele, Spectator, No. 4.

Memory even in early childhood never functions alone; . . . it is or appears to be essentially connected with the vivacity of the perceptions and the exactitude of the judgments. B. Perez, quoted in Mind, XII. 284.

4. That which is vivacious; a vivacious act or saying. [Rare.]

"Jacques Damour," . . . in spite of a few vivacities of speech, is a play with which the censure, to escape which is a principal object of the Théâtre Libre, would not dream of meddling. Athenæum, No. 3198, p. 189.

=Syn. 3. Life, Liveliness, etc. See animation.

vivandière (vē-von-di-ãr′), n. [F., fem. of vivandier = Sp. vivandero = Pg. vivandeiro, < It. vivandiere, a sutler, < vivanda, food: see viand.] A woman attached to French and other continental regiments, who sells provisions and liquor. Vivandières still exist in the French army, but the uniform, which was generally a modified form of that of the regiment, has been abandoned by order.

vivarium (vī-vā′ri-um), n.; pl. vivariums, vivaria (-umz, -ä). [< L. vivarium, an inclosure in which game, fish, etc., are kept alive, < vivus, living, alive, < vivere, live: see vivid.] A place where animals of any kind are kept alive in their natural state as far as possible; a vivary; a zoölogical park. A vivarium may be adapted to all kinds of animals; one for special purposes may be called by a particular name. A place for fish, etc., is an aquarium (of which the generic opposite is terrarium); for birds, an aviary; for frogs, a ranarium; for mollusks, a snailery, etc. A vivarium in popular language takes its name from the animals kept in it, as piggery, hennery, etc.

There is also adjoining to it a vivarium for estriges, peacocks, swanns, cranes, etc. Evelyn, Diary, Nov. 17, 1644.

vivary (vī′va-ri), n.; pl. vivaries (-riz). [< L. vivarium: see vivarium.] A vivarium. [Rare.]

The garden has every variety, hills, dales, rocks, grooves, aviaries, vivaries, fountaines. Evelyn, Diary, Oct. 22, 1644.

That cage and vivary
Of fowls and beasts.
Donne, Progress of the Soul, iii.

vivat (vī′vat), n. [= F. vivat (as L.), also vive = It. Sp. Pg. viva; < L. vivat, 3d pers. sing. pres. subj. of vivere, live: see vivid. Cf. viva, vive[2].] An exclamation of applause or joy; a viva.

Twenty-seven millions travelling on such courses, with gold jingling in every pocket, with vivats heaven high, are incessantly advancing . . . to the firm land's end.
Carlyle.

viva voce (vī′vä vō′sē). [L., by or with the living voice: vivā, abl. sing. fem. of vivus, living; voce, abl. sing. of vox, voice: see voice.] By word of mouth; orally. It is sometimes used attributively: as, a viva voce vote.

The king's attorney, on the contrary,
Urg'd on the examinations, proofs, confessions
Of divers witnesses; which the duke desired
To have brought vivâ voce to his face.
Shak., Hen. VIII., ii. 1. 18.

Nothing can equal a viva-voce examination for trying a candidate's knowledge in the contents of a long history or philosophical treatise. The Nation, XLVIII. 306.

vivda, n. See vifda.

vive[1] (vīv), a. [< F. vif, fem. vive, lively, quick, < L. vivus, alive, < vivere, live: see vivid.] 1†. Lively; vivid; vivacious; forcible. Bacon, War with Spain.

Not that I am able to express by words, or utter by eloquence, the vive image of my own inward thankfulness.
Wilson's James I. (Nares.)

2. Bright; clear; distinct. [Scotch.]

vive[2] (vēv), interj. [F. (= It. viva), 3d pers. sing. impv. of vivre, live: see viva, vivat.] Long live: as, vive le roi, long live the king; vive la bagatelle, success to trifles or sport.

vively† (vīv′li), adv. [< vive[1] + -ly[2].] In a vivid or lively manner.

Where statues and Joves acts were vively limn'd.
Marston, Sophonisba, iv. 1.

A thing vively presented on the stage.
B. Jonson, Magnetick Lady, ii. 1.

vivency† (vī′ven-si), n. [< L. viven(t-)s, ppr. of vivere, live, + -cy.] Manner of living.

Although not in a distinct and indisputable way of vivency. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 1.

viveret†, n. [ME., < OF. vivier, < L. vivarium, a vivarium: see vivarium.] A vivarium.

And before the Mynstre of this Ydole is a Vyvere, in maner of a gret Lake fulle of Watre: and there in Pilgrymes casten Gold and Sylver, Perles and precyous Stones, with outen nombre, in stede of Offrynges.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 174.

Viverra (vī-ver′ä), n. [NL., < L. viverra, a ferret.] A Linnean genus of carnivorous quadrupeds which contained 6 species (now placed in different modern families), and which has by successive restrictions been confined to the true civets as the type of the family Viverridæ. See cuts under civet-cat and tangalung.

Viverridæ (vī-ver′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Viverra + -idæ.] A family of carnivorous mammals, of the æluroid or feline series of the fissiped Feræ, typified by the genus Viverra. The family has been made to cover a miscellaneous assortment of animals, such as the coatis and bassarids of the New World, some of the Mustelidæ, the kinkajou (Cercoleptes), the Cryptoproctidæ, etc. Excluding all these, the Viverridæ constitute a natural and very extensive and diversified family of small cat-like or weasel-like carnivorous quadrupeds, digitigrade, or almost plantigrade, generally with long, low body, short legs, long and sometimes prehensile or curly tail, and long, sharp snout, and for the most part provided with peculiar anal glands secreting the substance called civet or a similar product. All the Viverridæ belong to the Old World, in the warmer parts of which their genera, species, and individuals abound. Their nearest relatives are the hyenas. In the æluroid series (see Æluroidea) the Viverridæ are distinguished by the number of their teeth, which are thirty-four to forty, there being on each side of the upper jaw two molars (exceptionally one), four premolars (exceptionally three), one canine, and three incisors; and on each side of the under jaw two molars, four premolars (exceptionally three), one canine, and three incisors; the upper molars and the back lower molar are tuberculate. The Viverridæ fall naturally into two main divisions, based primarily upon certain cranial characters, and distinguished outwardly by the arched toes and sharp retractile claws of the one section, as contrasted with the straight toes and blunt claws of the other: these are respectively styled æluropod or cat-footed, and cynopod or dog-footed. The former is the viverrine section in strictness, the latter the herpestine section; each has several subfamilies. (a) To the viverrine section belong the typical civets and genets, forming the subfamily Viverrinæ; the prionodons, Prionodontinæ; the galidians, Galidiinæ; the palm-cats or paradoxures, with curly tails, Paradoxurinæ; the binturongs, Arctictidinæ; the hemigales, Hemigalinæ; and the cynogales, Cynogalinæ. (See cuts under civet-cat, Cynogale, Galidictis, genet, musang, nandine, and tangalung.) (b) To the herpestine section belong the numerous ichneumons, mongooses, etc., forming the restricted Herpestinæ, of which upward of 12 genera and many species are known; the cynictis, Cynictidinæ; the Rhinogalinæ; and the suricates, Crossarchinæ. (See cuts under Cynictis, ichneumon, and Suricata.) In all, there are some 30 genera of Viverridæ, of 11 subfamilies of 2 sections. Besides furnishing the civet of commerce, the Viverridæ take the place of ordinary cats and weasels in destroying smaller vermin, and some of them are of the greatest service, owing to their destruction of venomous reptiles, crocodiles' eggs, etc.

viverriform (vī-ver′i-fôrm), a. [< L. viverra, ferret, + forma, form.] Viverrine in form and structure: noting the large series of Old World quadrupeds of the families Viverridæ and Eupleridæ.

Viverrinæ (viv-e-rī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Viverra + -inæ.] A division of Viverridæ. (a) Broadly, one of two subfamilies of Viverridæ, the other being Herpestinæ, distinguishing the civets, genets, etc., from the ichneumons, etc.; the cat-footed Viverridæ, as distinguished from the dog-footed series of the same. (b) Narrowly, one of 11 subfamilies of Viverridæ, including only the civets and genets proper, of the genera Viverra, Viverricula, Genetta, having the body comparatively robust and cat-like, and the molars 2 above and 1 below on each side. See also cuts under civet-cat, genet, and tangalung.

Rasse (Viverricula malaccensis).

viverrine (vī-ver′in), a. and n. [< NL. viverrinus, < L. viverra, a ferret: see viverra.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Viverridæ; viverriform in a proper sense; more particularly, belonging to the Viverrinæ; not herpestine.—Viverrine cat, the wagati, Felis viverrina of India, a true cat.—Viverrine dasyure, a variety of Dasyurus maugei of South Australia and Tasmania.

II. n. A member of the Viverridæ, and especially of the Viverrinæ.

Also viverrin.

vivers (vē′vėrz), n. pl. [< F. vivres, provisions, < vivre, live, < L. vivere, live. Cf. viand.] Food; eatables; victuals. [Scotch.]

I could never away with raw oatmeal, slockened with water, in all my life. Call it drammock or crowdie, or just what ye list, my vivers must thole fire and water.
Scott, Pirate, v.

vives (vīvz), n. pl. [Also corruptly fives; shortened from avives, < OF. avives, also vives, a disease of horses, < Sp. avivas, adivas = Pg. adibe (cf. It. vivole, ML. vivolæ), a disease of animals, < Ar. addhība, < al, the, + dhība, she-wolf.] A disease of animals, particularly of horses, and more especially of young horses at grass, located in the glands under the ear, where a tumor is formed which sometimes ends in suppuration.

Vives, "Certaine kirnels growing under the horsses eare." Topsell, 1607, p. 360. (Halliwell.) vivianite (viv′i-an-īt), n. [Named after J. H. Vivian, an English metallurgist.] In mineral., a hydrous phosphate of iron protoxid, occurring crystallized, also cleavable, massive, fibrous, and earthy, nearly colorless when altered, but on exposure becoming blue or green. The earthy variety, called blue iron earth or native Prussian blue, is sometimes used as a pigment.

vivid (viv′id), a. [< L. vividus, animated, spirited, < vivere, live, akin to vita, life, Gr. βίος, life, Skt. √ jīv, live: see vital and quick.] 1. Exhibiting the appearance of life or freshness; animated; bright; clear; lively; fresh; strong; intense: as, the vivid colors of the rainbow; the vivid green of flourishing vegetables.

The fullest and most vivid colours.
Newton, Opticks, I. ii. 10.

Vivid was the light
Which flashed at this from out the other's eye.
Wordsworth.

All yielding is attended with a less vivid consciousness than resistance. George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, vi. 13.

A good style is the vivid expression of clear thinking.
Huxley, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXIX. 461.

2. Producing a distinct and strong impression on the mind; presented to the mind with exceptional clearness and force; of a mental faculty, having a clear and vigorous action.

Where the genius is bright, and the imagination vivid, the power of memory may be too much neglected and lose its improvement. Watts, Improvement of the Mind, i. 17.

Pope, whose vivid genius almost persuaded wit to renounce its proper nature and become poetic.
Lowell, New Princeton Rev., I. 159.

Somewhere in the list of our imaginations of absent feelings there must be found the vividest of all. These optical reproductions of real form are the vividest of all.
W. James, Prin. of Psychol., II. 260.

=Syn. 1. Lucid, striking, lustrous, luminous, vigorous.

vividity (vi-vid′i-ti), n. [< vivid + -ity.] 1. The character or state of being vivid; vividness. [Rare.]

Strength of attention, clearness of discernment, amplitude of comprehension, vividity and rapidity of imagination. Bentham, Introd. to Morals and Legislation, vi. 12.

2†. Vitality.

The withdrawing of competent meat and drink from the body . . . makes way for dryness, whence the kindly heat (which, like other fire, might be a good servant, must needs be an ill master), getting more than due and wonted strength, . . . turns on that substantial vividity, exsiccating and consuming it.
Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 430.

vividly (viv′id-li), adv. In a vivid manner; so as to be vivid, in any sense.

vividness (viv′id-nes), n. The property of being vivid, in any sense; vividity.

All great steps in science require a peculiar distinctness and vividness of thought in the discoverer. Whewell.

vivific (vī-vif′ik), a. [= F. vivifique = Sp. vivifico = Pg. It. vivifico, < LL. vivificus, making alive, quickening: see vivify.] Giving life; reviving; enlivening; vivifying. [Rare.]

Without whose [the sun's] salutary and vivific beams all motion . . . would speedily cease, and nothing be left here below but darkness and death.
Ray, Works of Creation, i.

vivifical (vī-vif′i-kal), a. [< vivific + -al.] Same as vivific.

vivificant (vī-vif′i-kant), a. [= OF. vivifiant = Sp. Pg. vivificante, < LL. vivifican(t-)s, ppr. of vivificare, make alive: see vivify.] Vivific; vivifying. Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 685.

vivificate (vī-vif′i-kāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. vivificated, ppr. vivificating. [< LL. vivificatus, pp. of vivificare, make alive: see vivify.] 1. To give life to; animate; vivify. [Rare.]

With his understanding free to think of other things, even as God vivificates and actuates the whole world, being yet wholly free to contemplate himself.
Dr. H. More, Philosophic Cabbala, i.

2. In old chem., to restore or reduce to the natural state or to the metallic state, as a substance from a solution or a metal from an oxid; revive.

vivification (viv″i-fi-kā′shon), n. [< F. vivification = Sp. vivificación = Pg. vivificação = It. vivificazione, < LL. vivificatio(n-), a making alive, a quickening, < vivificare, pp. vivificatus, make alive: see vivify.] 1. The act of vivifying, or the state of being vivified; the act of giving life; revival. [Rare.]

The nature of vivification is best inquired in creatures bred of putrefaction. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 695.

Sub. And when comes vivification?
Face. After mortification.
B. Jonson, Alchemist, ii. 1.

It [the heart] is the member that hath first life in man, and it is the last that dies in man, and to all the other members gives vivification. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 258.

2. In physiol., the transformation of proteid matter into living tissue, occurring as the final stage of assimilation.

vivificative (viv′i-fi-kā-tiv), a. [< vivificate + -ive.] Capable of vivifying. [Rare.]

That lower vivificative principle of his soul did grow . . . strong, and did . . . vigorously, and with . . . exultant sympathy and joy, actuate his vehicle.
Dr. H. More, Philosophic Cabbala, ii.

vivifier (viv′i-fī-ėr), n. One who vivifies; a quickener.

He [man] has need of a Vivifier, because he is dead.
St. Augustine, On Nature and Grace (trans.), xxv.

vivify (viv′i-fī), v.; pret. and pp. vivified, ppr. vivifying. [< F. vivifier = Sp. Pg. vivificar = It. vivificare, < LL. vivificare, make alive, restore to life, quicken (cf. vivificus, making alive), < vivus, alive, + facere, make, do.] I. trans. To make to be living; endue with life; animate; enliven; inspire as if with life. Harvey.

Winds of hostility . . . rather irritated and vivified the sense of security. De Quincey, Philos. of Rom. Hist.

Her childish features were vivified and enlightened by an expression of innocent intelligence charming to behold. The Century, XXXVIII. 213.

II. intrans. To impart life or animation.

The second Adam, sleeping in a vivifying death, onely for the saluation of Mankinde, should sanctifie his Spouse the Church by those Sacraments which were deriued out of his side. Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 374.

Viviparæ† (vī-vip′a-rē), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of LL. viviparus, viviparous: see viviparous.] Those vertebrates which are viviparous: an old division, contrasted with Ovipara, and containing the mammals. De Blainville. The division is worthless, as some mammals are oviparous, and many of the lower vertebrates are viviparous, as are also some invertebrates. The name is a survival of the unfittest from the time of Aristotle, the later Vivipara or Zoötoka being the ζωοτοκοῦντα ἐν αὐτοῖς (mammals) of that author.

Viviparidæ (vīv-i-par′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Vivipara (the typical genus) + -idæ.] A family of tænioglossate gastropods, typified by the genus Vivipara. They have a flat foot, moderate rostrum, elongate tentacles, with one of which the male organ is adnate, eyes on prominences at the outer bases of the tentacles, radular teeth 3, 1, 3, the median broad, the lateral obliquely oblong, and the marginal with narrow bases or unguiform; the shell spiral, with a continuous peritreme, and a more or less concentric operculum. It is a cosmopolitan group of fresh-water shells. Representatives of four genera occur in the United States, but of one only in Europe. They have often been called Paludinidæ.

viviparity (vīv-i-par′i-ti), n. [< vivipar(ous) + -ity.] The state, character, or condition of being viviparous; the act, process, or result of bringing forth alive.

viviparoid (vī-vip′a-roid), a. and n. I. a. Of or relating to the Viviparidæ.

II. n. One of the Viviparidæ.

viviparous (vī-vip′a-rus), a. [= F. vivipare = Sp. vivíparo = Pg. It. viviparo, < LL. viviparus, that brings forth young alive, < L. vivus, alive, + parere, bring forth, produce.] 1. Bringing forth alive; having young which maintain vascular vital connection with the body of the parent until they are born in a comparatively advanced stage of development; reproducing by birth, not by hatching from an egg which is laid and afterward incubated: correlated with oviparous and ovoviviparous. See these words, and egg[1]. In strictness, all metazoic animals and some protozoans are oviparous, since they produce ova; but the distinction subsists in the duration of the period in which the product of conception remains in the body of the parent. If the egg is quickly extruded, the animal is oviparous; if it is separated from the mother, but hatches inside the body, ovoviviparous; if it comes to term in a womb, viviparous. Among vertebrates, all mammals excepting monotremes, no birds, many reptiles, and some fishes are viviparous. Invertebrates are mostly oviparous, in some cases ovoviviparous, in a few viviparous.

2. In bot., germinating or sprouting from a seed or bud which is still on the parent plant. The term is also sometimes equivalent to proliferous as applied to grasses, rushes, sedges, etc. See prolification, 2.

From an examination of the structure of viviparous grasses. Masters, Teratol., p. 169.

Viviparous blenny, Zoarces viviparus (formerly Blennius viviparus), a fish of the family Zoarcidæ. See Zoarces. — Viviparous fish, a fish which brings forth alive, especially a viviparous perch. Numerous other fishes, belonging to different families, are of this character, as nearly if not all of the Zoarcidæ, including the so-called viviparous blenny, certain scorpænoids, cyprinodonts, blind-fishes, and most sharks and rays. — Viviparous knotweed, the serpent-grass, Polygonum viviparum. — Viviparous lizard, the British Zoötoca vivipara. See Zoötoca. — Viviparous perch. See perch[1], surf-fish, and Embiotocidæ. — Viviparous shell, any member of the Viviparidæ.

viviparously (vī-vip′a-rus-li), adv. In a viviparous manner; by viviparity.

viviparousness (vī-vip′a-rus-nes), n. Same as viviparity.

Viviparus (vī-vip′a-rus), n. [NL.: properly Vivipara (Lamarck, 1809), < LL. viviparus: see viviparous.] The typical genus of Viviparidæ, to which different limits have been ascribed, but always including such species as V. vulgaris and V. contecta of Europe. Several species inhabit the United States, as V. georgiana and V. contectoides.

Vivipara vulgaris: the branchiæ and embryos seen through the shell.

viviperception (viv″i-per-sep′shon), n. [< L. vivus, living, + perceptio(n-), perception.] The observation of physiological functions or vital processes in their natural action without dissection of the living body: distinguished from observation by means of vivisection. J. J. G. Wilkinson. [Rare.]

vivisect (viv-i-sekt′), v. [< L. vivus, living, + sectus, pp. of secare, cut.] I. trans. To dissect the living body of; practise vivisection upon; anatomize, as a living animal. Athenæum, No. 3200, p. 252. [Recent.]

II. intrans. To practise vivisection; dissect a living animal. [Recent.]

vivisection (viv-i-sek′shon), n. [< F. vivisection = Sp. vivisección, < L. vivus, living, + sectio(n-), a cutting: see section.] Dissection of a living body; the practice of anatomizing alive, or of experimenting upon living animals, for the purpose of investigating some physiological function or pathological process which cannot well be otherwise determined. Vivisection strictly includes only cutting operations; but the term is extended to any physiological experimentation upon living animals, as compression of parts by ligatures, subjection of the creature to special conditions of atmospheric pressure, temperature, and food, exhibition of poisons or other drugs, inoculation of disease, etc. Vivisection in competent and humane hands, under proper and reasonable restrictions, is fruitful of good results to the sciences of physiology and pathology.

The Vivisection Act of 1876 . . . is intended for the protection of vertebrate animals liable to be employed alive in physiological experiments. Encyc. Brit., XV. 799.

Painless vivisection, callisection.

vivisectional (viv-i-sek′shon-al), a. [< vivisection + -al.] Of or pertaining to vivisection.

The best way to enter the subject will be to take a lower creature, like a frog, and study by the vivisectional method the functions of his different nerve-centres.
W. James, Prin. of Psychol., I. 111.

vivisectionist (viv-i-sek′shon-ist), n. [< vivisection + -ist.] A vivisector; also, one who favors or defends the practice of vivisection.

Physiology, it is said, can scarcely be called a science as yet, and the contributions of vivisectionists to the understanding and amelioration of human suffering have been almost nothing. G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 20.

vivisector (viv-i-sek′tor), n. [< L. vivus, living, + sector, a cutter: see sector.] One who practises vivisection.

A judge or jury might have opinions as to the comparative value of the results obtained which would differ widely from those of the vivisector himself.
Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, VII. 682.

vivisectorium (viv″i-sek-tō′ri-um), n.; pl. vivisectoria (-ä). [NL.: see vivisect.] A place where vivisections are made.

Students have turned away sickened not only from the vivisectorium but from the study of medicine.
G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 20.

vivisepulture (viv-i-sep′ul-tūr), n. [< L. vivus, living, + sepultura, burial: see sepulture.] The burial of a person alive. [Rare.]

Pliny . . . speaks of the practice of vivisepulture as continued to his own time.
Dean Liddell, Archæologia, XL. 243. (Davies.)

vivo (vē′vō), a. [It., < L. vivus, living: see vive.] Same as vivace.

vivré (vē-vrā′), a. [Heraldic F., < OF. vivre, F. givre, a serpent: see viper.] In her., gliding: applied to a serpent used as a bearing.

vixen (vik′sn), n. and a. [Formerly also vixon; var. of fixen, < ME. fixen, < AS. fyxen*, fixen, a she-fox: see fixen.] I. n. 1. A she-fox.

Fixen. This is the name of a she-fox, otherwise and more anciently foxin. It is in reproach applied to a woman whose nature and condition is thereby compared to the shee-fox.
Verstegan, Rest. of Decayed Intelligence (ed. 1628), p. 334.

They is Plumstead foxes, too; and a vixen was trapped just across the field yonder . . . no later than yesterday morning. Trollope, Last Chronicle of Barset, xxxiii.

The destruction of a vixen in April is a distinct blow to sport in the following season.
Edinburgh Rev., CLXVI. 412.

Hence—2. A turbulent, quarrelsome woman; a scold; a termagant: formerly used occasionally of a man.

I think this be the curstest quean in the world; you see what she is, a little fair, but as proud as the devil, and the veriest vixen that lives upon God's earth.
Peele, Old Wives Tale.

O, when she 's angry, she is keen and shrewd!
She was a vixen when she went to school;
And, though she be but little, she is fierce.
Shak., M. N. D., iii. 2. 324.

Those fiery vixons, who (in pursuance of their base designs, or gratification of their wild passions) really do themselves embroil things, and raise miserable combustions in the world. Barrow, Sermons, I. xvii.

I hate a Vixon, that her Maid assails,
And scratches with her Bodkin, or her Nails.
Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

II. a. Vixenish.

Better [health] than he deserves, for disturbing us with his vixen brawls, and breaking God's peace and the King's.
Scott, Antiquary, xxii.

vixenish (vik′sn-ish), a. [< vixen + -ish[1].] Of, pertaining to, or resembling a vixen; cross; ill-tempered; snarling.

A vixenly pope. Barrow, Pope's Supremacy.

Nevertheless, vixenly as she looks, many people are seeking, at this very moment, to shelter themselves under the wing of the federal eagle.
Hawthorne, Scarlet Letter, Int., p. 4.

viz. An abbreviation of videlicet, usually read 'namely.' The z here, as in oz., represents a medieval symbol of contraction (a symbol also represented by a semicolon), originally a ligature for the Latin et, and (and so equivalent to the symbol &), extended to represent the termination -et and the enclitic conjunction -que, and finally used as a mere mark of abbreviation, equivalent in use to the period as now so used, viz being equivalent to vi., and not originally requiring the period after it.

Vizagapatam work. See work.

vizament† (vī′za-ment), n. [A varied form of visement*, for avisement, advisement.] Advisement. [An intentionally erroneous form.]

The council, look you, shall desire to hear the fear of Got, and not to hear a riot; take your vizaments in that.
Shak., M. W. of W., i. 1. 39.

vizard†, n. An obsolete form of visor.

vizard-mask†, n. 1. A vizor; a mask.

That no Woman be Allow'd or presume to wear a Vizard Mask in either of the Theatres.
J. Ashton, Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, II. 11.

2. One who wears a mask or vizor.

There is Sir Charles Sedley looking on, smiling with or at the actors of these scenes, among the audience, . . . or flirting with vizard-masks in the pit.
Doran, Annals of the Stage, I. 172.

vizie, n. See visie.

vizir, vizier (vi-zēr′, often erroneously viz′iėr), n. [Also visier, vezir, wizier; = F. visir, vizir = Sp. visir = Pg. vizir = It. visire = G. vezir = D. vizier = Sw. Dan. visir, < Turk. vezīr, < Ar. wazīr, a counselor, orig. a porter, bearer of the burdens of state, < wazara, bear a burden, sustain. Cf. alguazil, ult. the same word with the Ar. article.] The title of various high officials in Mohammedan countries, especially of the chief ministers of state.

Thus utter'd Coumourgi, the dauntless vizier;
The reply was the brandish of sabre and spear.
Byron, Siege of Corinth, xxii.

His subjects, headed by a set of hereditary ministers called viziers, have risen to oppose certain reforms proposed by Purrus Ram.
W. H. Russell, Diary in India, II. 165.

Grand vizir, the highest officer of state in certain Mohammedan countries; in the Turkish empire, the prime minister and formerly also commander of the army.

vizirate, vizierate (vi-zēr′āt), n. [< vizir, vizier, + -ate[3].] The office, state, or authority of a vizir.

vizirial, vizierial (vi-zē′ri-al), a. [< vizir, vizier, + -ial.] Of, pertaining to, or issued by a vizir.

I appealed . . . to firmans and vizirial letters, in which force, as a means of proselytism, was strictly forbidden.
J. Baker, Turkey, p. 181.

vizirship, viziership (vi-zēr′ship), n. [< vizir, vizier, + -ship.] The office or authority of a vizir.

Over the whole realm of song arose the Oriental dynasty under the prime viziership of Byron.
W. Mathews, Getting on in the World, p. 105.

vizor, visor (viz′ọr), n. [Formerly also visour, and more correctly viser, also visar, and, with excrescent -d, visard, vizard; < ME. viser, visere, vysere, < OF. visiere, F. visière, a vizor, < vis, face, countenance: see vis[1], visage.] 1. Formerly, a mask concealing the face; hence, in general, any disguise or means of concealment.

Under the viser of envie
Lo thus was hid the trecherie.
Gower, Conf. Amant., ii.

Lately within this realm divers persons have disguised and apparelled them, and covered their faces with visours and other things in such manner that they should not be known. Laws of Henry VIII. (1511), quoted in Ribton-[Turner's Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 70.

This lewd woman,
That wants no artificial looks or tears
To help the vizor she has now put on.
B. Jonson, Volpone, iv. 2.

2. In more modern usage, the movable front of the helmet in general; more accurately, the upper movable part. Where there are two it is also called nasal. See cuts under armet and helmet.

Yet did a splinter of his lance Through Alexander's visor glance.
Scott, Marmion, iii. 24.

And the knight
Had visor up, and show'd a youthful face.
Tennyson, Geraint.

3†. The countenance; visage.

This loutish clown is such that you never saw so ill-favoured a vizar. Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, i.

4. The fore piece of a cap, projecting over and protecting the eyes.

vizor, visor (viz′ọr), v. t. [< vizor, n.] To cover with a vizor, in any sense.

Hence with thy brew'd enchantments, foul deceiver!
Hast thou betray'd my credulous innocence
With visor'd falsehood and base forgery?
Milton, Comus, l. 698.

vizorless, visorless (viz′ọr-les), a. [< vizor, visor, + -less.] Having no vizor.

Vlach (vlak), a. and n. Same as Wallachian.

vlack-vark (vlak′värk), n. [< D. vlek, formerly also vlak, vlack, spot (= E. fleck), + vark, < varken, hog, pig: see farrow[1] and pork, and cf. aardvark.] The wart-hog of South Africa, Phacochœrus æthiopicus, very similar to the species figured under Phacochœrus (which see).

vlaie, n. Same as vly.

Vlemingkx's solution. See solution.

vly (vlī or flī), n. [Also vley, vlei, rarely vlaie, erroneously fly; in local use in New York and New Jersey and in South Africa, in regions first settled by the Dutch. No D. form vley appears in the D. dictionaries; it is prob. a local contraction, in a slightly deflected use, of D. valey (Sewel, 1766), now vallei, orig. valleye (Kilian, 1598), a valley, vale, dale: see valley.] A swamp or morass; a shallow pond; a depression with water in it in the rainy season, but dry at other times.

Up over the grassy edge of the basin which formed the vly, and down the slope which led to the gate, the children came bounding pell-mell. The Atlantic, LXIII. 581.

I have seen numbers of these tall nests in the shallow pans of water—or vleys, as they are locally called—in Bushmanland. Nature, XXXVII. 465.

To the same settlers [the Dutch] are due the geographical appellations of kill for stream, clove for gorge, and vly or vlaie for swamp, so frequently met with in the Catskills.
A. Guyot, Amer. Jour. Sci., 3d ser., XIX. 432.

The large vlei, that was dry when he had previously crossed it, but was now gemmed by little rain-pools, affording baths for little groups of ducks, amid the green herbage of its bed. Baines, Ex. in S. W. Africa, p. 293.

V-moth (vē′môth), n. A European geometrid moth, Halia vauaria: so called from a dark-brown V-shaped mark on the fore wing: a British collectors' name.

Voandzeia (vō-and-zē′iạ), n. [NL. (Thouars, 1806), from the name in Madagascar.] A genus of leguminous plants, of the tribe Phaseoleæ. It is distinguished from the closely related genus Vigna by a one-seeded roundish legume, which ripens beneath the ground. The only species, V. subterranea, is a native of tropical Africa. It is a creeping herb with long-stalked leaves of three pinnate leaflets, and short axillary few-flowered peduncles recurved after flowering. The flowers are of two kinds—one bisexual, small, and pale; the other fertile and apetalous, lengthening, and pushing the young pod into the earth, in which it ripens like a peanut. It is cultivated from Bambarra and Guinea to Natal in Africa, and is now naturalized in Brazil and Surinam. Both pods and seeds are edible; they are known as the Bambarra ground-nut, earth-pea, underground bean, or Madagascar peanut, and are exported into India under the name of Mozambique grain. See gobbe, the name in Surinam, and compare goober.

voc. An abbreviation of vocative.

vocable (vō′kạ-bl), n. [< F. vocable = Sp. vocablo = Pg. vocabulo = It. vocabolo = G. vocabel, < L. vocabulum, an appellation, a designation, name, ML. a word, < vocare, call: see vocation.] A word; a term; a name; specifically, a word considered without regard to meaning, but merely as composed of certain sounds or letters.

We will next endeavour to understand that vocable or term tyrannus (that is, a tyrant or an evil king) cast upon Richard. Sir G. Buck, Hist. Rich. III., v. 569.

A word or two may be spared to the formidable-looking vocable Conciossiacosachè, which so excited Alfieri's bile.

The orator treads in a beaten round; . . . language is ready-shaped to his purpose; he speaks out of a cut and dry vocabulary. R. L. Stevenson, Virginibus Puerisque, iv.

=Syn. 1. Vocabulary, Dictionary, Glossary, Lexicon, Nomenclature. A vocabulary, in the present use, is a list of words occurring in a specific work or author, generally arranged alphabetically, concisely defined, and appended to the text; whereas we generally apply the term dictionary to a word-book of all the words in a language or in any department of art or science, without reference to any particular work: thus, we speak of a vocabulary to Cæsar, but of a dictionary of the Latin language, or of architecture, chemistry, etc. An exception to this may be where the words of an author are so fully treated, by derivation, illustration, etc., as to seem to amount to more than a vocabulary: as, a Homeric dictionary. A glossary is yet more restricted than a vocabulary, being a list and explanation of such terms in a work or author as are peculiar, as by being technical, dialectal, or antiquated: as, a glossary to Chaucer, Burns, etc.; a glossary of terms of art, philosophy, etc. Lexicon was originally and is often still confined to dictionaries of the Greek or Hebrew tongues, but it is also freely applied to a dictionary of any dead or merely foreign language: as, a German-English lexicon. A nomenclature is a complete list of the names or technical terms belonging to any one division or subdivision of science.—2. Idiom, Diction, etc. See language.

vocabulist (vō-kab′ū-list), n. [< F. vocabuliste; as L. vocabulum, a word, + -ist.] 1. The writer or compiler of a vocabulary; a lexicographer.—2†. A vocabulary; a lexicon.

vocal (vō′kạl), a. and n. [< F. vocal = Sp. Pg. vocal = It. vocale, < L. vocalis, sounding, sonorous, as a noun, vocalis, a vowel, < vox (voc-), voice: see voice. Cf. vowel, a doublet of vocal.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to the voice, to speech, or to song; uttered or modulated by the voice; oral.

Forth came the human pair,
And join'd their vocal worship to the quire.
Milton, P. L., ix. 198.

Some years hence, for all we know, we may be able to transmit the vocal message itself, with the very inflection, tone, and accent of the speaker.
J. Baille (1871), quoted in Prescott's Elect. Invent., p. 47.

A tin pipe ascends through the ceiling, and forms a medium of vocal communication with other parts of the edifice. Hawthorne, Scarlet Letter, Int., p. 7.

2. Having a voice; endowed, or as if endowed, with a voice; possessed of utterance or audible expression.

The stream, the wood, the gale,
Is vocal with the plaintive wail.
Scott, L. of L. M., v. 2.

The roving bee proclaims aloud
Her flight by vocal wings.
Wordsworth, Gold and Silver Fishes in a Vase.

The tide flows down, the wave again
Is vocal in its wooded walls.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, xix.

3. In phonetics: (a) Voiced; uttered with voice as distinct from breath; sonant: said of certain alphabetic sounds or letters, as z or v or b as distinguished from s or f or p respectively. (b) Having a vowel character or function; vowel.

The vocal (vowel) mechanism is the first that is manifested in the child. Alien. and Neurol. (trans.), VIII. 7.

4. In zoöl., voiced; uttered by the mouth; formed in the vocal organs: distinguished from sonorific: noting the cries of animals, as distinguished from the mechanical noises they may make, as the stridulation of an insect.—Vocal auscultation, examination by the sound of the voice as transmitted through the lungs and chest-wall.—Vocal cords. See cord[1].—Vocal fremitus, a vibration felt on palpation of the wall of the chest when the subject speaks in an audible tone. Also called voice-thrill, pectoral fremitus, and pectoral thrill.—Vocal glottis. Same as rima vocalis (which see, under rima).—Vocal music, music prepared for or produced by the human voice alone or accompanied by instruments, in distinction from instrumental music, which is prepared for or produced by instruments alone.—Vocal process, the prolonged inner basal angle of the arytenoid cartilage, to which the true vocal cord is attached.—Vocal resonance. See resonance.—Vocal score. See score[1], 9.—Vocal spiracle, in entom., a thoracic spiracle or breathing-pore having a peculiar interior apparatus supposed to produce sounds, as in the bees and many flies.—Vocal tone, an instrumental tone similar in quality to the singing-tone of the human voice.—Vocal tube, in anat., the space which the sound of the voice has to traverse after it is produced in the glottis, including the passages through the nose and mouth.

vocalic (vō-kal′ik), a. [< vocal + -ic.] Relating to, consisting of, or resembling vowel sounds; containing many vowels.

The Gaelic language, being uncommonly vocalic, is well adapted for sudden and extemporaneous poetry.
Scott, Waverley, xxii.

The vowels become more consonantal; the consonants become more vocalic.
Whitney, Life and Growth of Lang., iv.

vocalisation, vocalise. See vocalization, vocalize.

vocalism (vō′kal-izm), n. [< F. vocalisme; as vocal + -ism.] 1. The exercise of the vocal organs in speech or song; vocalization.

We should now be talking in monosyllables, and eking out our scantiness of vocalism by nods, shrugs, winks, and other resources of pantomime. F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 19.

2. A vocalic sound.

To utter such thick-lipped vocalisms as Mosos.
Earle, Philology of Eng. Tongue, i. § 126.

3. See nominalism.

vocalist (vō′kal-ist), n. [< F. vocaliste; as vocal + -ist.] A vocal musician; a singer, as opposed to an instrumental performer.

She was a good vocalist; and, even in speech, her voice commanded a great range of changes.
R. L. Stevenson, Prince Otto, ii. 4.

vocality (vō-kal′i-ti), n.; pl. vocalities (-tiz). [= Sp. vocalidad, < L. vocalita(t-)s (tr. Gr. εὐφωνία), open sound, euphony, < vocalis, sounding, sonorous: see vocal.] The quality of being vocal. (a) The quality of being utterable or capable of being expressed by the voice in speech or song.

I did hear Mrs. Manuel and one of the Italians, her gallant, sing well. But yet I confess I am not delighted so much with it as to admire it; for not understanding the words, I lose the benefit of the vocalitys of the musick, and it proves only instrumental. Pepys, Diary, III. 334.

L and R being in extreams, one of Roughness, the other of Smoothness and freeness of Vocality, are not easie, in tract of Vocal speech, to be pronounced spiritally.
Holder, Elem. of Speech, p. 58.

(b) The quality of being a vowel; vowel character: as, the vocality of a sound.

vocalization (vō″kal-i-zā′shon), n. [< F. vocalisation = Sp. vocalización; as vocalize + -ation.] 1. The act of vocalizing or uttering with the voice, the state of being so uttered, or the manner of such utterance, whether in speech or in song: as, the deceptive vocalizations of a ventriloquist.

Knowing what one discontented woman can do in the way of vocalization, it is possible to imagine the clamor multiplied by hundreds. The Century, XXXVII. 585.

2. The formation and utterance of vowel sounds.

Vocalization (vowelizing) is the expression of an emotion, an indistinct sensation, not an idea.
Alien. and Neurol. (trans.), VIII. 7.

Also spelled vocalisation.

vocalize (vō′kal-īz), v.; pret. and pp. vocalized, ppr. vocalizing. [< F. vocaliser = Sp. vocalizar = It. vocalizzare; as vocal + -ize.] I. trans. 1. To form into voice; make vocal.

It is one thing to breath, or give impulse to breath alone, and another thing to vocalize that breath, i. e., in its passage through the larynx to give it the sound of humane voyce. Holder, Elem. of Speech, p. 30.

2. To utter with voice and not merely with breath; make sonant: as, f vocalized is equivalent to v.—3. To write with vowel points; insert the vowels in, as in the writing of the Semitic languages.

The question "Should Turkish poetry be vocalized?" is answered in the affirmative by R. Dvorak. Arabic books, especially Arabic poetry, are vocalized in the East as well as in the West. Turkish books to some extent, and this should be done throughout. D. advocates the use of Arabic vowel-signs, which would prove a great help to the student. Amer. Jour. Philol., X. 232.

Vochy (vō′ki), n. [NL. (Aublet, 1775), the name among the Galibis of Guiana.] A genus of plants, type of the family Vochyaceæ. It is characterized by flowers with three (or fewer) petals, a single fertile stamen, and a three-celled ovary with two ovules in each cell. There are about 54 species, natives of Brazil, Guiana, eastern Peru, and the United States of Colombia. They are tall trees, or sometimes shrubs, often resinous, and with very handsomely netted-veined coriaceous leaves. The flowers are large, bright-orange or yellow, and odorous, forming elongated compound racemes or panicles; the leaves are decussate and opposite, or whorled. The wood is a valuable compact but not durable timber; that of V. Guianensis is known as itaballi-wood and copaiyé-wood. The flowers are singularly irregular: the posterior sepal is much larger than the other four, and usually spurred, and the petals are linear and spatulate, the anterior being much the larger. The fruit is a coriaceous and woody three-celled and three-valved capsule, containing three erect winged or cottony seeds.

Vochyaceæ (vō-ki-ā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. St. Hilaire, 1820), < Vochy + -aceæ.] A family of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants, of the order Geraniales. It is characterized by irregular flowers, a three-celled ovary, and a straight embryo, usually without albumen. It includes about 100 species, belonging to 5 genera, of which the type Vochy with 54, Qualea with 30, and Erisma with 7 species are the chief; all occur mostly in Brazil and Guiana. They are trees, often of immense size and with a copious resinous juice, fetid in the genus Callisthene; a few are shrubs. The flowers are bisexual, irregular, variously colored, often large, handsome, and odorous, and commonly racemose or panicled. They are remarkable in some of the genera for producing but a single petal, or but a single fertile stamen. The fruit is usually an oblong terete or three-angled capsule, with three coriaceous valves, often with winged pilose or cottony seeds, and large leaf-like corrugated cotyledons; in Erisma, a genus of trees of great size, the fruit is a very peculiar samara with long coriaceous falcate reticulated wings developed from calyx-segments.

vociferance (vō-sif′e-rans), n. [< vociferan(t) + -ce.] Vociferation; clamor; noise.

From the L. vox, or the verb vocare, call, are ult. E. vocal, vowel, vocable, advocate, advowson, avocation, vouch, avouch, convoke, evoke, invoke, provoke, revoke, equivocal, univocal, vocation, vociferate, etc.] 1. The sound uttered by the mouths of living creatures; especially, human utterance in speaking, singing, crying, shouting, etc.; the sound made by a person in speaking, singing, crying, etc.; the character, quality, or expression of the sounds so uttered: as, to hear a voice; to recognize a voice; a loud voice; a low voice.

Thei gon before him with processioun, with Cros and Holy Watre; and thei syngen Veni Creator Spiritus with an highe Voys, and gon towardes him.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 244.

Ther sat a faucon over hire hed ful hye,
That with a pitous voys so gan to cry.
Chaucer, Squire's Tale, l. 404.

Her voice was ever soft,
Gentle, and low, an excellent thing in woman.
Shak., Lear, v. 3. 273.

Voice as a scientific term may mean either the faculty of uttering audible sounds, or the body of audible sounds produced by the organs of respiration, especially the larynx of man and other animals: contradistinguished from speech or articulate language. Voice is produced when air is driven by the muscles of expiration from the lungs through the trachea and strikes against the two vocal cords (see cord[1]), the vibrations of which produce sounds varying in different animals according to the structure of the organs and the power which the animal possesses over them. Voice can, therefore, be found only in animals in which this system of respiration is developed, and the lungs and larynx (or syrinx) actually exist. Fishes, having no lungs, are dumb, as far as true vocal utterance is concerned, though various noises may issue from their throats (see croaker, grunt, and drum). In man the superior organization and mobility of the tongue and lips, as well as the perfection of the larynx, enable him to modify his vocal sounds to an almost infinite extent. In ordinary speaking the tones of the voice have nearly all the same pitch, and the variety of the sounds is due rather to the action of the mouth-organs than to definite movements of the glottis and vocal cords. In singing the successive sounds correspond more or less closely to the ideal tones of the musical scale. The male voice admits of division into tenor and bass, and the female into soprano and contralto. The lowest female tone is an octave or so higher than the lowest tone of the male voice; and the female's highest tone is about an octave above that of the male. The compass of both voices taken together is four octaves or more, the chief differences residing in the pitch and also in the timbre. In medicine, voice is the sound of utterance as transmitted through the lungs and chest-wall in auscultation. In zoölogy, voice is ordinarily restricted to respiratory sounds or vocal utterance, as above explained, and as distinguished from any mechanical noise, like stridulation, etc. The more usual word for the voice of any animal is cry; and the various cries, distinctive or characteristic of certain animals, take many distinctive terms, according to their vocal quality, as bark, bay, bellow, bleat, bray, cackle, call, caw, chatter, chirp, chirrup, cluck, coo, croak, crow, gabble, gobble, growl, grunt, hiss, honk, hoot, howl, low, mew, neigh, peep, pipe, purr, quack, roar, scream, screech, snarl, snort, song, squall, squawk, squeak, squeal, trumpet, twitter, warble, waul, whine, whinny, whistle, whoop, yawp, yell, yelp, and many others. The voices of some animals, as certain monkeys and large carnivores and ruminants, may be heard a mile or more. The voice reaches its highest development, in animals other than human, in the distinctively musical class of birds, some of which, notably parrots and certain corvine and sturnoid birds, can be taught to talk intelligible speech.

2. The faculty of speaking; speech; utterance.

It [emancipation] shall bid the sad rejoice,
It shall give the dumb a voice,
It shall belt with joy the earth!
Whittier, Laus Deo!

3. A sound produced by an inanimate object and regarded as representing the voice of an intelligent being: as, the voice of the winds.

The floods have lifted up their voice. Ps. xciii. 3.

The twilight voice of distant bells.
Whittier, The Merrimack.

Rain was in the wind's voice as it swept Along the hedges where the lone quail crept.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I. 393.

4. Anything analogous to human speech which conveys impressions to any of the senses or to the mind.

I, now the voice of the recorded law,
Pronounce a sentence on your brother's life.
Shak., M. for M., ii. 4. 61.

E'en from the tomb the voice of Nature cries.
Gray, Elegy.

5. Opinion or choice expressed; the right of expressing an opinion; vote; suffrage: as, you have no voice in the matter.

Sic. How now, my masters! have you chose this man?
First Cit. He has our voices, sir. Shak., Cor., ii. 3. 164.

Matters of moment were to be examined by a Iury, but determined by the maior part of the Councell, in which the President had two voyces.
Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I. 151.

They who seek nothing but thir own just Liberty have always right to win it, and keep it, whenever they have Power, be the Voices never so numerous that oppose it.
Milton, Free Commonwealth.

Let us call on God in the voice of the church. Bp. Fell.

My voice is still for war.
Gods! can a Roman senate long debate
Which of the two to choose, slavery or death!
Addison, Cato, ii. 1.

He possibly thought that in the position I was holding I might have some voice in whatever decision was arrived at. Nineteenth Century, XXVI. 861.

6. One who speaks; a speaker.

A potent voice of parliament,
A pillar steadfast in the storm.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, cxiii.

This no doubt is one of the chief praises of Gray, as of other poets, that he is the voice of emotions common to all mankind. Lowell, New Princeton Rev., I. 173.

7. Wish or admonition made known in any way; command; injunction.

Ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the Lord your God. Deut. viii. 20.

He is dull of hearing who understands not the voice of God, unless it be clamorous in an express and a loud commandment. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 8.

8†. That which is said; report; rumor; hence, reputation; fame.

The common voice, I see, is verified
Of thee. Shak., Hen. VIII., v. 3. 176.

I fear you wrong him;
He has the voice to be an honest Roman.
B. Jonson, Sejanus, iv. 5.

Philenzo's dead already; . . .
The voice is, he is poison'd.
Shirley, Bird in a Cage, v. 1.

The Lord of Andover is to have £20,000 in lieu of his mastership of the Horse, besides being to be made an earl and a privy counsellor, as the voice goes.
Court and Times of Charles I., I. 19.

9†. A word; a term; a vocable. Udall.—10. In phonetics, sound uttered with resonance of the vocal cords, and not with a mere emission of breath; sonant utterance.—11. In gram., that form of the verb or body of inflections which shows the relation of the subject of the affirmation or predication to the action expressed by the verb. In Latin there are two voices, active and passive, having different endings throughout. In Greek and Sanskrit the voices are active and middle, certain forms, mostly middle, being used in a passive sense. In English, again, there is no distinction of voices; every verb is active, and a passive meaning belongs only to certain verb-phrases, made with help of an auxiliary: thus, he is praised, we have been loved.—Equal voices, in music. See equal.—In my voice†, in my name.

Implore her, in my voice, that she make friends
To the strict deputy. Shak., M. for M., i. 2. 185.

Inner voice. See inner part, under inner.—In voice, in a condition of vocal readiness for effective speaking or singing.—Mean voice. See mean[3].—Middle voice, in music. See middle part, under middle.—Veiled voice. See veil, n., 7.—Voice of the silence, intelligible words which some persons seem to themselves to hear in certain hypnotic states, as the clairaudient, and also in some cerebral disorders; an auditory hallucination.—With one voice, unanimously.

The Greekish heads, which with one voice
Call Agamemnon head and general.
Shak., T. and C., i. 3. 221.

voice (vois), v.; pret. and pp. voiced, ppr. voicing. [< voice, n.] I. trans. 1. To give utterance to; assert; proclaim; declare; announce; rumor; report.

Rather assume thy right in silence . . . than voice it with claims and challenges. Bacon, Great Place (ed. 1887).

Here is much lamentation for the King of Denmark, whose disaster is voiced by all to be exceeding great.
Court and Times of Charles I., I. 148.

We are, in fact, voicing a general and deepening discontent with the present state of society among the working classes. N. A. Rev., CXLIII. 229.

2. To fit for producing the proper sounds; regulate the tone of: as, to voice the pipes of an organ. See voicing.—3. To write the voice-parts of. Hill, Dict. Mus. Terms.—4†. To nominate; adjudge by acclamation; declare.

Your minds,
Pre-occupied with what you rather must do
Than what you should, made you against the grain
To voice him consul. Shak., Cor., ii. 3. 242.

Like the drunken priests
In Bacchus' sacrifices, without reason Voicing the leader-on a demi-god.
Ford, Broken Heart, i. 2.

Rumour will voice me the contempt of manhood,
Should I run on thus. Ford, Broken Heart, iii. 2.

5. In phonetics, to utter with voice or tone or sonancy, as distinguished from breath.

II.† intrans. To speak; vote; give opinion.

I remember, also, that this place [Acts xvi.] is pretended for the people's power of voicing in councils.
Jer. Taylor, Episcopacy Asserted, § 41.

Or some angel voic'd like her.
Sir J. Denham, The Sophy. (Latham.)

voiceful (vois'fûl), a. [< voice + -ful.] Having a voice; vocal; sounding.

The seniors then did bear
The voiceful heralds' sceptres, sat within a sacred sphere,
On polish'd stones, and gave by turns their sentence.
Chapman, Iliad, xviii. 459.

The swelling of the voiceful sea.
Coleridge, Fancy in Nubibus.

voicefulness (vois'fûl-nes), n. The property or state of being voiceful; vocality.

In the wilds of these isles one drinks in the spirit of the sea, and its deep voicefulness fills the air.
Portfolio, N. S., IX. 187.

voiceless (vois'les), a. [< voice + -less.] 1. Having no voice, utterance, or vote; mute; dumb.

The proctors of the clergy were voiceless assistants.
Coke. (Latham.)

Childless and crownless, in her voiceless woe.
Byron, Childe Harold, iv. 79.

2. In phonetics, not voiced or sonant; surd.

voicelessness (vois'les-nes), n. The state of being voiceless; silence.

voice-part (vois'pärt), n. See part, 5, and part-writing.

voicer (voi'sėr), n. One who voices or regulates the tone of organ-pipes.

voice-thrill (vois'thril), n. Same as vocal fremitus (which see, under vocal).

voicing (voi'sing), n. [Verbal n. of voice, v.] The act, process, or result of regulating the tone of organ-pipes, so that they shall sound with the proper power, pitch, and quality. Voicing is the most delicate and important branch of organ-building, since success in it depends on attention to the minutest details.

void (void), a. and n. [< ME. void, voyd, voide, < OF. voide, vuide, m. and f., also void, vuid, vuit, m., empty, waste, vast, wide, hollow, also deprived, destitute, devoid; as a noun, a void, waste; F. vide, empty, devoid; according to the usual derivation, < L. viduus, bereft of husband or wife, bereft, deprived; but this derivation is difficult phonetically and in view of the existing F. veuf, m., veuve, f., widowed, deprived (as a noun, a widower, widow), from the same L. viduus. The F. vide for vuide, however, has been influenced by association with the L. viduus. Another derivation, < LL. as if vocitus* for vacitus*, akin to vacare, be empty, vacuus, empty, vacivus, vocivus (see vacuous, vacant), rests on assumption. Cf. avoid, devoid.] I. a. 1. Empty, or not containing matter; vacant; not occupied; unfilled: as, a void space or place.

And he that shall a-complysshe that sete must also complysshe the voyde place at the table that Ioseph made.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), i. 61.

The earth was without form, and void [was waste and void, R. V.], and darkness was upon the face of the deep.
Gen. i. 2.

I'll get me to a place more void, and there
Speak to great Cæsar as he comes along.
Shak., J. C., ii. 4. 37.

In the void offices around Rung not a hoof, nor bayed a hound.
Scott, Rokeby, ii. 17.

2. Having no holder or possessor; vacant; unoccupied; without incumbent.

The Bishoprick of Winchester falling void, the king sends presently to the Monks of the Cathedral Church to elect his Brother Athelmar. Baker, Chronicles, p. 83.

A plantation should be begun at Agawam (being the best place in the land for tillage and cattle), least an enemy, finding it void, should possess and take it from us.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 118.

3†. Not taken up with business; leisure.

All the void time that is between the hours of work, sleep, and meat, that they be suffered to bestow every man as he liketh best himself.
Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), ii. 4.

I chain him in my study, that, at void hours,
I may run over the story of his country. Massinger.

4. Being without; devoid; destitute; lacking; without; free from: usually with of: as, void of learning; void of common sense.

The moste parte of noble men and gentlemen within this Realme haue bene brought vp ignorantly and voide of good educac[i]ons.
Booke of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), i. 10.

Ye must be void from that desperate solicitude.
Traves, in Bradford's Letters (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 3.

He that is void of wisdom despiseth his neighbour.
Prov. xi. 12.

5. Not producing any effect; ineffectual; useless; vain; superfluous.

Voide leves puld to be.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 150.

Wyth bones & voyd morsels fyll not thy trenchour, my friend, full. Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 79.

The game [rocks of Scilly] is reckoned in the same manner as at mississipi, and the cast is void if the ball does not enter any of the holes.
Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 398.

6. Specifically, in law, without legal efficacy; incapable of being enforced by law; having no legal or binding force; null; not effectual to bind parties, or to convey or support a right: as, a deed not duly signed and sealed is void; a promise without consideration is void. In strictness the word is appropriate only of that which is so utterly without effect that a person may act as if it did not exist; but a thing may be void as to some persons and not as to others. Void is, however, often used in place of voidable. Voidable is appropriate for that which a person has the right to make of no effect by application to court to have it adjudged void, or in some cases by notice or declaration, as a conveyance in fraud of creditors which is effectual between the parties, but may be avoided by a creditor, or a contract of an infant, which may be effectual until he has disaffirmed it. That which is void is generally held incapable of confirmation; that which is simply voidable may be confirmed.

7†. Devoid of wealth; poor.

Yif thow haddyst entred in the path of this lyf a voyde wayferinge man, than woldest thow synge byforn the thef.
Chaucer, Boëthius, ii. prose 5.

To make void, to render useless or of no effect.

For if they which are of the law be heirs, faith is made void, and the promise made of none effect. Rom. iv. 14.

It was thy device
By this alliance to make void my suit.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., iii. 3. 142.

Void for uncertainty, said of a legal instrument the language of which is so vague or ambiguous that it cannot take effect.—Void space, in physics, a vacuum.=Syn. 1, 2, and 4. Devoid, etc. See vacant.—6. Invalid.

II. n. 1. An empty or unoccupied space; a vacuum.

The Void of Heav'n a gloomy Horror fills.
Congreve, Birth of the Muse.

The illimitable Void. Thomson, Summer, l. 34.

I do not like to see anything destroyed, any void produced in society. Burke, Rev. in France.

What peaceful hours I once enjoyed!
How sweet their memory still!
But they have left an aching void
The world can never fill.
Cowper, Oh, for a closer walk with God!

2. An opening; a solution of continuity in an inclosure of any kind; a space unfilled or not built up, as contrasted with closed or occupied areas.

The clerestory window [of Notre Dame, Paris], . . . although larger than such openings had been in Romanesque design, . . . nevertheless is simply an opening in a wall, the area of the solid still being greater than that of the void. C. H. Moore, Gothic Architecture, p. 86.

3†. The last course or remove; the dessert.

There was a void of spice-plates and wine.
Coronation of Anne Boleyn (Arber's Eng. Garner, II. 50).

void (void), v. [< ME. voiden, < OF. voider, voidier, vuidier, vuider, F. vider = Pr. voiar, voyar, vueiar, voidar = Cat. vuydar, make void; from the adj. Cf. avoid.] I. trans. 1. To make or leave vacant; quit; vacate; depart from; leave; hence, to clear; free; empty.

They voidede the cite of Ravenne by certeyn day assigned. Chaucer, Boëthius, i. prose 4.

Now this feest is done, voyde ye the table.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 271.

Good Frederick, see the rooms be voided straight.
Marlowe, Faustus, iii. 4.

If they will fight with us, bid them come down,
Or void the field. Shak., Hen. V., iv. 7. 62.

The princes would be private. Void the presence.
Marston, The Fawne, iii.

2. To emit, throw, or send out; empty out; specifically, to evacuate from the intestine or bladder: as, to void excrementitious matter.

volborthite (vol'bôr-thīt), n. [So called after Alexander von Volborth, a Russian physician and scientist, by whom the species was described in 1838.] A mineral occurring in small tabular crystals of a green or yellow color and pearly luster. It is a hydrous copper vanadate.

volcanian (vol-kā'ni-an), a. [< volcano + -ian.] Of or pertaining to a volcano; characteristic of or resembling a volcano; volcanic. [Rare.]

> A deep volcanian yellow took the place
> Of all her milder-mooned body's grace.
> Keats, Lamia, i.

★ volcanic (vol-kan'ik), a. [= F. volcanique = Sp. volcánico = Pg. volcanico = It. vulcanico; as volcano + -ic.] Pertaining to or produced by volcanoes or volcanic action: as, volcanic heat, volcanic rock, volcanic phenomena, etc.—Volcanic bombs, masses of lava, varying greatly in shape and size, but usually roughly rounded and occasionally hollow. Blocks of this kind, of immense size, have been thrown out by some South American volcanoes.—Volcanic focus, the supposed seat or center of activity in a volcanic region or beneath a volcano.—Volcanic glass, vitreous lava; obsidian.—Volcanic mud, the mixture of ashes and water either discharged from the crater of a volcano or formed on its flanks by the downward rush of water: called lava d'acqua in Italy, and moya in South America. It was by mud-lava that Herculaneum was overwhelmed, and mud has been poured out on an immense scale by the volcanoes of Java and South America.—Volcanic rock, rock which has been formed by volcanic agency; lava.

volcanically (vol-kan'i-kal-i), adv. In the manner of a volcano; eruptively; figuratively, in a fiery or explosive manner.

> The accumulation of offences is . . . too literally exploded, blasted asunder volcanically. Carlyle, Heroes, iv.

volcanicity (vol-ka-nis'i-ti), n. [< volcanic + -ity.] Same as volcanism: rarely used. It is an imitation of the French term volcanicité formerly in use, but later French writers prefer volcanisme.

> The term volcanic action (volcanism or volcanicity) embraces all the phenomena connected with the expulsion of heated materials from the interior of the earth to the surface. Geikie, Text-Book of Geol. (2d ed.), p. 178.

volcanism (vol'ka-nizm), n. [< volcano + -ism.] The phenomena connected with volcanoes and volcanic activity. As used by Humboldt and some others, it includes also earthquakes, hot springs, and every form of geological dynamics directly connected with the "reaction of the interior of our planet against its crust and surface" (Humboldt). Also vulcanism.

> To throw some light on the nature and connection of the chief causes which have been concerned in carrying on that complicated series of geological dynamics which we include under the comprehensive term of volcanism, and of which the earthquake and volcano are two of the most striking manifestations.
> J. D. Whitney, Earthquakes, Volcanoes, and Mountain-Building, p. 69.

volcanist (vol'ka-nist), n. [< volcano + -ist.] One who is versed in or occupied with the scientific study of the history and phenomena of volcanoes.

volcanity (vol-kan'i-ti), n. [< volcan(ic) + -ity.] The state of being volcanic or of volcanic origin. [Rare.]

★ volcano (vol-kā'nō), n.; pl. volcanoes, volcanos (-nōz). [Formerly also vulcano; = F. volcan (> Sp. volcán = Pg. volcão, vulcão), < It. volcano, also vulcano, a burning mountain, prop. first applied to Mt. Etna, which was especially feigned to be the seat of Hephæstus (Vulcan), < L. Volcanus, later Vulcanus, Vulcan, the god of fire, also fig. fire: see Vulcan.] 1. A mountain or other elevation having at or near its apex an opening in the earth's crust from which heated materials are expelled either continuously or at regular or irregular intervals. These materials are molten rock (lava), ashes, cinders, large fragments of solid rock, mud, water, steam, and various gases. Such openings are ordinarily surrounded by more or less conical accumulations of the erupted materials, and it is to such cones that the term volcano is usually applied. The opening through which the lava rises is called the vent or chimney, and the cup-shaped enlargement of it, in its upper parts, the crater; there may be one such opening at the summit or on the flanks of the cone, or there may be a considerable number of them. In many volcanoes a central cone has upon its flanks a considerable number of minor cones (parasitic cones, as they are sometimes called). Etna has more than two hundred quite conspicuous cones within a radius of ten miles from the center of the main crater. The size and elevation of volcanoes vary greatly. The very high ones, like Cotopaxi and Popocatepetl and many others, are built up on high plateaus; others, like the extinct or dormant volcanoes of the Sierra Nevada of California, are chiefly made up of other than volcanic material, masked by the flow of eruptive matter down the slopes of a preëxisting older mass. Volcanoes and volcanic regions vary greatly in the degree of their activity and in the length and frequency of their periods of repose; those volcanoes which during the historic period have shown no signs of activity are said to be extinct, or dormant if a long interval has elapsed since the last eruption. Nothing definite was known of the volcanic forces pent up within the area covered by Vesuvius prior to A. D. 79, when the great catastrophe took place by which Pompeii was overwhelmed, and which was briefly described by Pliny the Younger in his narrative of the death of his uncle, Pliny the Elder. Volcanoes and volcanic areas are very irregularly distributed over the earth, but are chiefly in the neighborhood of the ocean. The Asiatic and the American shores of the Pacific — not continuously, but in many places — are dotted with volcanoes, from Japan to the islands of the Indian Ocean, and from Patagonia to Alaska. The most active volcanic center in the world is the island of Java and its vicinity. This island, having about the area of England, contains forty-nine great volcanic cones, some of which are 12,000 feet in height. The eruption of Krakatoa, an island in the Sunda Strait, which took place in the closing days of August, 1883, was the most violent and destructive event of the kind of which history has any record. Nearly forty thousand persons were drowned along the coast adjacent to the Strait of Sunda by waves set in motion by the inrush of water to fill the cavity caused by the expulsion of material from the crater.

2. A kind of firework. See fizgig[1], 2.—Submarine volcano. See submarine.—Volcano-ship, a vessel loaded with combustibles and missiles for explosion against another ship or against a stationary structure.

> The burning volcano-ship at the siege of Antwerp.
> Motley, Hist. Netherlands, II. 157.

volcanoism (vol-kā'nō-izm), n. [< volcano + -ism.] Violent and destructive eruptiveness. [Rare.]

> Not blaze out, . . . as wasteful volcanoism, to scorch and consume! Carlyle, Past and Present, ii. 10.

volcanological (vol-kā-nō-loj'i-kal), a. [< volcanolog-y + -ical.] Relating to or in the manner of volcanology; in a scientific manner, from the point of view of the investigator of volcanic phenomena. Also vulcanological.

volcanology (vol-kā-nol'ō-ji), n. [< volcano + Gr. -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The scientific study of volcanic phenomena. Also vulcanology.

> His annual account of the progress in volcanology and seismology for 1885. Athenæum, No. 3068, p. 210.

vole[1] (vōl), n. [< F. vole, < voler, fly, < L. volare, fly: see volant.] In card-playing, a winning of all the tricks played in one deal.

vole[1] (vōl), v. i.; pret. and pp. voled, ppr. voling. [< vole[1], n.] In card-playing, to win all the tricks played in one deal.

vole[2] (vōl), n. [Short for vole-mouse.] A short-tailed field-mouse or meadow-mouse; a campagnol or arvicoline; any member of the genus Arvicola in a broad sense. All the Microtinæ are voles, though some of them, as the lemming and muskrat, are usually called by other names. They are mostly terrestrial, tending to be aquatic, abound in the sphagnous swamps and low moist ground of nearly all parts of the northern hemisphere, and are on the whole among the most mischievous of mammals. The common vole, meadow-mouse, or short-tailed field-mouse of Europe is M. agrestis.

Common European Meadow-vole (Microtus agrestis).

The water-vole or water-rat is a larger species, M. amphibius, almost as aquatic as a muskrat. Some voles are widely distributed, though none are common to the northerly parts of both hemispheres; a few species extend into the tropics. The commonest representatives in the United States are M. pennsylvanicus, M. austerus, and M. pinetorum. A very large species of British America is M. xanthognatha. The name vole is purely British, being seldom heard in the United States, or used in books treating of the American species, which are called field-mice and meadow-mice. See also cuts under Arvicola, Evotomys, Synaptomys, and water-rat. Microtus (Schrank) antedates Arvicola.

volently† (vō'lent-li), adv. Willingly. [Rare.]

> Into the pit they run against their will that ran so volently, so violently, to the brink of it.
> Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 237.

volery† (vol'e-ri), n.; pl. voleries (-riz). [Also volary, vollary; < OF. voliere, a cage, coop, dovecote, F. volière, an aviary, also OF. volier, a large cage or aviary; cf. volerie, "a place over the stage which we called the heaven" (Cotgrave), i. e. 'place of flying'; < voler, fly, < L. volare, fly: see volant.] 1. A large bird-cage or inclosure in which the birds have room to fly.

> I thought thee then our Orpheus, that wouldst try,
> Like him, to make the air one volary.
> B. Jonson, Underwoods, xvi.

> Sitting moping like three or four melancholy Birds in a spacious Vollary. Etherege, Man of Mode, v.

> Having seene the roomes, we went to ye volary, wch has a cupola in the middle of it, greate trees and bushes, it being full of birds, who drank at two fountaines.
> Evelyn, Diary, March 1, 1644.

2. The birds confined in such an inclosure; a flight or flock of birds.

> An old boy, at his first appearance, . . . is sure to draw on him the eyes and chirping of the whole town volery, amongst which there will not be wanting some birds of prey. Locke, Education, § 94.

volet (vol'ā), n. [OF. volet, a cloth spread on the ground to hold grain, a shutter, etc., < voler, fly, < L. volare, fly: see volant.] 1. A veil, especially one worn by women, and forming a part of the outdoor dress in the middle ages.—2. In painting, one of the wings or shutters of a picture formed as a triptych, as in Rubens's "Descent from the Cross" in Antwerp Cathedral, the volets of which are painted on both sides.

> Small triptychs with folding-doors or volets in boxwood. S. K. Cat. Spec. Exh. 1862, No. 1042.

3. A door, or one leaf of a door, in ornamental furniture and similar decorative objects.

volget, n. [< L. volgus, vulgus, the common people: see vulgar.] The vulgar; the rabble.

> One had as good be dumb as not speak with the volge.
> Fuller, Ch. Hist., XI. viii. 32. (Davies.)

volitable† (vol'i-ta-bl), a. [< L. volitare, fly to and fro: see volitant.] Capable of being volatilized; volatilizable.

volitant (vol'i-tant), a. [< L. volitan(t-)s, ppr. of volitare, fly to and fro, freq. of volare, fly: see volant.] Flying; having the power of flight; volant: as, the bat is a volitant quadruped.

Volitantia† (vol-i-tan'shi-ä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of volitan(t-)s, flying: see volitant.] In Illiger's classification of mammals (1811), the eleventh order, containing flying quadrupeds in two families, Dermoptera and Chiroptera, or the so-called flying-lemurs and the bats—thus an artificial group, now abolished.

volitation (vol-i-tā′shon), n. [< L. volitare, pp. volitatus, fly to and fro: see volitant.] The act of flying; the power of flight, or its habitual exercise; flight; volation.

volitational (vol-i-tā′shon-al), a. [< volitation + -al.] Of or pertaining to volitation or flight.

Volitatores† (vol″i-tā-tō′rēz), n. pl. [NL., < L. volitare, fly: see volitant.] In ornith., in Macgillivray's system, an order of birds, the skimmers, composed of such species as swallows, bee-eaters, and goatsuckers: an artificial group.

volitatory (vol′i-tā-tō-ri), a. [< L. volitare, pp. volitatus, fly, + -ory.] Same as volitorial.

volitient (vō-lish′ent), a. [Irreg. < voliti(on) + -ent.] Having freedom of will; exercising the will; willing. [Rare.]

> I [Lucifer] chose this ruin; I elected it
> Of my will, not of service. What I do
> I do volitient, not obedient.
> Mrs. Browning, Drama of Exile.

volition (vō-lish′on), n. [< F. volition = Sp. volición = Pg. volição = It. volizione, < ML. volitio(n-), will, volition, < L. velle, ind. pres. volo, will: see *will*¹.] 1. The act of willing; the exercise of the will; voluntary consciousness. Regarded as conscious content, a volition is a complex process, nearly akin to emotion, but differing from this in the fact of its direction upon an end.

> The actual exercise of that power [the will], by directing any particular action or its forbearance, is . . . volition.
> Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxi. 5.

Will is indeed an ambiguous word, being sometimes put for the faculty of willing, sometimes for the act of that faculty, besides other meanings. But volition always signifies the act of willing, and nothing else. Willingness, I think, is opposed to unwillingness or aversion. A man is willing to do what he has no aversion to do, or what he has some desire to do, though perhaps he has not the opportunity; and I think this is never called volition.
Reid, Letter to Dr. J. Gregory (Works, ed. Hamilton, p. 79).

An artist's brain receives and stores images often without distinct volition. T. Winthrop, Cecil Dreeme, xvii.

When a man's arm is raised in sequence to that state of consciousness we call a volition, the volition is not the immediate cause of the elevation of the arm.
Huxley, in Nineteenth Century, XXI. 495.

2. The power of willing; will.

> In that young bosom are often stirring passions as strong as our own, . . . a volition not less supreme. D'Israeli.

The play of the features, the vocal exclamations, the gesticulations of the arms, &c., come under the domain of our volition. A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 362.

volitional (vō-lish′on-al), a. [< volition + -al.] Of or pertaining to volition.

> The volitional impulse. Bacon.

What is termed self-control, prudential restraint, moral strength, consists in the intellectual permanency of the volitional element of our feelings.
A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 21.

There is no more miserable human being than one in whom nothing is habitual but indecision, and for whom the lighting of every cigar, the drinking of every cup, the time of rising and going to bed every day, and the beginning of every bit of work, are subjects of express volitional deliberation. W. James, Prin. of Psychol., I. 122.

Volitional insanity, a form of mental disease in which the most striking phenomena are those relating to perverted or impaired will-power.

volitionally (vō-lish′on-al-i), adv. In a volitional manner; as respects volition; by the act of willing.

> It was able to move its right leg volitionally in all directions. Lancet, 1890, I. 1415.

volitionary (vō-lish′on-ā-ri), a. [< volition + -ary.] Volitional.

Dr. Berry Haycraft gave an account of some experiments which extend our knowledge of volitionary movement and explain the production of the muscle and heart sounds. Nature, XLI. 358.

volitionless (vō-lish′on-les), a. [< volition + -less.] Without volition.

> The volitionless will.
> J. Owen, Evenings with Skeptics, II. 415.

volitive (vol′i-tiv), a. [< volit(ion) + -ive.] 1. Having the power to will; exercising volition.

> It is, therefore, an unreasonable conceit to think that God will continue an active, vital, intellective, volitive nature, form, power, force, inclination, in a noble substance, which shall use none of these for many hundred or thousand years, and so continue them in vain.
> Baxter, Dying Thoughts.

2. Originating in the will.

> Wundt regards apperception as a particular process, inserted between perception and volitive excitement.
> Alien. and Neurol. (trans.), VI. 519.

3. In rhet., expressing a wish or permission: as, a volitive proposition.

Volitores (vol-i-tō′rēz), n. pl. [NL., prop. Volatores*, pl. of volator, a flier: see volator.] In Owen's classification, those birds which move solely or chiefly by flight, or are preëminent in ability to fly. It is the fifth order of the system, embracing 11 families, as the swifts, humming-birds, goatsuckers, kingfishers, hornbills, etc., intervening between his Cantores or singers and Scansores or climbers. It is an artificial group, practically equivalent to those Picariæ which are not yoke-toed, or to Picariæ with the old group Scansores eliminated. [Not in use.]

volitorial (vol-i-tō′ri-al), a. [< Volitores + -ial.] Of or pertaining to the Volitores.

Volkameria (vol-ka-mē′ri-ä), n. [NL., named in honor of Volkamer, a German botanist.] 1. A Linnean genus of verbenaceous shrubs, by most authors included as a section in Clerodendrum. It includes 2 or 3 species, natives of the warmer parts of America. Volkameria aculeata is sometimes cultivated in greenhouses and in tropical gardens.

2. [l. c.] A plant of the genus Volkameria.

Volkmannia (volk-man′i-ä), n. [NL., < Volkmann (see def.).] The generic name given by Sternberg (1825) to a group of verticillately stalked calamarian strobili whose real generic characters are uncertain, though some species described as Volkmannia are now referred, as cones, to Asterophyllites, Palæostachya, and Sphenophyllum. The plant was named in honor of G. A. Volkmann, author of "Silesia Subterranea" (1720), in which work some of the Carboniferous fossil plants of that part of Germany were described.

vollenget, n. See valanche.

volley (vol′i), n. [Formerly also vollie, voley; < ★OF. volee, F. volée = Sp. volada = It. volata, a flight, < ML. as if volata*, < L. volare, fly: see volant.] 1. The flight of a number of missile weapons together; hence, the discharge simultaneously, or nearly so, of a number of missile weapons.

> When with a volley of our needless shot.
> Shak., K. John, v. 5. 5.

2. Hence, a noisy or explosive burst or emission of many things at once.

> A fine volley of words, gentlemen, and quickly shot off.
> Shak., T. G. of V., ii. 4. 33.

> What were those thousands of blaspheming Cavaliers about him, whose mouthes let fly Oaths and Curses by the voley? Milton, Eikonoklastes.

> We heard a volley of oaths and curses.
> Addison, Tatler, No. 254.

3. In lawn-tennis and tennis, a return of the ball by the racket before it touches the ground, especially a swift return.—At volley, on the volley [F. à la volée], on the fly; in passing; at random.

> What we spake on the voley begins to work.
> Massinger, Picture, iii. 6.

> P. jun. Call you this jeering! I can play at this;
> 'Tis like a ball at tennis.
> Alm. It is indeed, sir,
> When we do speak at volley all the ill
> We can one of another. B. Jonson, Staple of News, iv.

★volley (vol′i), v. [< volley, n.] I. trans. 1. To discharge in a volley, or as if in a volley: often with out. Compare volleyed.

> Another [hound]
> Against the welkin volleys out his voice.
> Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 921.

2. In lawn-tennis and tennis, to return on the fly: said of the ball; drive (the ball) with the racket before it strikes the ground.

II. intrans. 1. To fly together, as missiles; hence, to issue or be discharged in large number or quantity.

> The volleying rain and tossing breeze.
> M. Arnold, Thyrsis.

> Nothing good comes of brass, from whose embrasures there vollies forth but impudence, insolence, defiance.
> A. B. Alcott, Tablets, p. 72.

2. To sound together, or in continuous or repeated explosions, as firearms.

> And there the volleying thunders pour,
> Till waves grow smoother to the roar.
> Byron, Siege of Corinth, ii.

> Cannon in front of them
> Volley'd and thunder'd.
> Tennyson, Charge of the Light Brigade.

3. In lawn-tennis and tennis, to return the ball before it touches the ground, especially by a swift stroke: as, he volleys well.

volley-gun (vol′i-gun), n. A machine-gun or mitrailleuse.

volowt (vol′ō), v. t. [< ME. folewen, folwen, fulwen, fullen, < AS. fulwian, fullian, baptize: see *full*³. The word is usually derived from L. volo, I will, that being the first word of the response used in the service.] To baptize: applied contemptuously by the Reformers.

> They brought them to confirmation straight from baptism, so that now oft-times they be volowed and bishopped both in one day.
> Tyndale, Ans. to Sir T. More, etc. (Parker Soc., 1850), p. 72.

volower† (vol′ō-ėr), n. One who baptizes.

Volscian (vol′sian), a. and n. [< L. Volsci, the Volscians: see II., 1.] I. a. Pertaining to the Volscians.

II. n. 1. A member of an ancient Italic people who dwelt southeast of Rome.—2. The language of the Volscians, related to Umbrian.

volsella (vol-sel′ä), n. 1. Same as vulsella.—2†. Same as acanthobolus.

volt¹ (vōlt), n. [< F. volte, a turn or wheel, < It. volta, a turn, < L. volvere, pp. volutus, turn about or round: see *vault*², volute.] 1. In the manège, a round or circular tread; a gait of two treads made by a horse going sidewise round a center, with the head turned outward.—2. In fencing, a sudden movement or leap to reach ★the enemy or to avoid a thrust.

volt² (vōlt), n. [= F. volte; < It. Volta, the name of the inventor of the voltaic battery.] The practical unit of electromotive force. It is 10^8 absolute units of E. M. F. on the centimeter-gram-second system of electromagnetic units, and is a little less than the E. M. F. of a Daniell cell. It is defined by the International Electrical Congress (1893) and by United States statute (1894) as the electromotive force that, steadily applied to a conductor whose resistance is one ohm, will produce a current of one ampere, and which is practically equal to $\frac{1000}{1434}$ of the E. M. F. between the poles of what is known as the standard Clark voltaic cell, at a temperature of 15° C.

volta (vōl′tä), n.; pl. volte (-te). [It., a turn: see *volt*¹.] 1. An old dance. See lavolta.—2. In music, turn or time: as, una volta, once; due volte, twice; prima volta, first time. Abbreviated v.

volta-electric (vol″tä-ē-lek′trik), a. Pertaining to voltaic electricity or galvanism: as, volta-electric induction.

volta-electricity (vol″tä-ē-lek-tris′i-ti), n. Same as voltaic electricity, or galvanic electricity. See electricity. See voltaic current, under voltaic.

volta-electrometer (vol″tä-ē-lek-trom′e-tėr), n. An instrument for the exact measurement of electric currents; a voltameter.

volta-electromotive (vol″tä-ē-lek-trō-mō′tiv), a. Producing, or produced by, voltaic electromotion.—Volta-electromotive force, electromotive force produced in a manner analogous to that of the voltaic battery.

voltage¹ (vōl′tāj), n. [< *volt*¹ + -age.] In the manège, the act of making a horse work upon ★volts. Ford, Fame's Memorial.
